Jesse Sorum and family whom have been making their home in Thief River Falls, since last fall when they moved there from Crookston, moved here last week. They have rented the Joseph Nelson residence.

Salvation Army Drive Ending

In regard to the annual Salvation Army Home Service Appeal which is now being completed in Marshall, Roseau, Kittson and Lake of the Woods Counties and in which the emphasis was laid on the need of funds in order that the Salvation Army might be able to give food and shelter to the many Minnesota unemployed who are asking help daily, the request is made by campaigner John M. Linden from the Warren headquarters that all solicitors in the rural school districts, among the lodges, clubs and societies and also the helpers in the towns check in their returns at the earliest possible moment either to campaign post office box No. 176, Warren, Minn., or to the General Treasurer, Mr. Carl O. Knutson, at the State Bank of Warren, at Warren, Minnesota.

Mr. Linden states that many worthy men are still jobless no employment is in sight, and that the Salvation Army is giving them a helping hand still and all funds given will be appreciated.

Marshall County Farmers Loan $12,296 from U. S.

The total amount of seed grain loans granted by the federal seed loan office in Grand Forks in Marshall county who sought assistance amounts to $12,296.02.

Only four applications were turned down by the loan offices after being approved by the Marshall county committee.

Eagle Point township farmers were loaned the largest amount while Fork township received the smallest sum, $3,271.20 went to farmers in the first named township while only $82.67 went to the other township.

Picnic Success

A great number of people from Holt motored out to the L. Sagstuen home near Golden Valley on Sunday to take in the church picnic held there by the Golden Valley congregation. The proceeds raised at the picnic were donated to the Wild Rice Orphans home.

The local male quartet and choir sang several songs on the program.

Mr. and Mrs. P. L. Anderson and family from Crookston visited at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Lorentson on Sunday.

Mrs. Geo. Fricker returned home on Saturday from Chisholm where she had spent several weeks visiting with her folks and friends.

Attend Editorial Meeting

H. O. Hanson and B. C. Hagglund spent Monday at Thief River Falls where they attended the annual summer meeting of the Red River Valley Editorial association.

R. D. Pfund of Ada was elected president to succeed Harry Phillips of Mahnomen and E. L. Berg of Kennedy was elected secretary-treasurer.

The next meeting will be held at Crookston in the fall.

Auction Sale of Horses

Great Northern Stock Yards, Thief River Falls, Minn., Saturday, June 13th, 1931, at 1 p. m.

Just arrived, one carload well-broken North Dakota horses, also one carload of colts. Now is the time to buy, as horses will be higher. There are very few western horses to be bought. Most places in Montana horses are too poor to ship, owing to the drought. These will be my last horses here this summer. Every horse will be guaranteed as represented. Time will be given.

Wanted: Your old and disabled horses for mink and fox feed.

NOW is the time to be on the lookout for grassy and weedy flavors in your cream. Flavors that show up even with the best of care.

Cream may be ever so sweet and still will go for second grade, just because it has that grassy flavor, which makes it unfit for use in Land O'Lakes butter.

By taking the cows off pasture two or three hours before milking, and by thoroughly stirring while cooling the cream it is possible to do away with a good deal of these off flavors.

"I'll Call Her Old Glory!"

CAPT. WILLIAM DRIVER
FAMILY OF ... IAM DRIV...

CAPT. DRIVER'S MONUMENT IN OLD CITY CEMETERY, NASHVILLE, TENN.

By ELMO SCOTT WATSON

THE American flag, whose birthday we celebrate on June 14, is known by a number of figurative names. It is probable that it was called "The Red, White and Blune" or "The Stars and Stripes" very soon after the first flag was made in accordance with the resolution passed by the Continental congress on June 14, 1777, "That the flag of the United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

The name "The Star-Spangled Banner" dates from 1814 when Francis Scott Key, watching the British bombardment of Fort McHenry, was inspired to write the poem which was later set to music and became the official national anthem. But the name "Old Glory" is a more recent one. It was just a hundred years ago that a Yankee skipper had the inspiration which resulted in that affectionate name being bestowed upon our national colors. Here is the story of how "Old Glory" got that name:

From the beginning of New England maritime history the Driver family of Salem, Mass., had been leaders in the shipping trade, not only as shipbuilders but as owners, captains and sailors of their own vessels. In the year 1831 Capt. William Driver was carrying on the family tradition. As a boy of twelve he had shipped on a sailing vessel for Europe and before he was twenty he was master of the brig, Charles Baggett, one of that innumerable fleet which sailed the Seven Seas and carried the name of Salem to every corner of the earth.

In September of that year Captain Driver was preparing to sail for a trip around the world. Just before leaving a party of his friends gathered to present him with a farewell gift, an American flag, because he was noted for his love for the national colors and what they betokened. Captain Driver was on deck to receive them and a sailor, carrying the flag, folded in triangular form, stepped forward and began a carefully memorized speech.

"In ancient times, when an ocean voyage was looked upon with superstitious dread," he said, "it was the custom on the eve of departure to roll the banner in the form of a triangle. When ready the priest stepped forward and taking the banner in hand, sprinkled it with consecrated water and dedicated it to 'God the Father, God the son and God the Holy host,' turning the point of the triangle upward at the name of each, thus calling on that unity of Creator, Redeemer and Sanctifier to bless the national emblem and prosper the voyagers and their friends. The flag thus consecrated was then hoisted to the masthead."

He then adjusted the flag to the halyards and hoisted it to its position at the masthead. Captain Driver, overcome with emotion, was silent for a moment. Then as he looked aloft and saw the flag which he loved so well floating in the breeze he exclaimed: "I'll call her Old Glory, boys; Old Glory!" And thus was the American flag christened with a new name for he was the first to use that name and by no other did he ever refer to it.

The voyage which was thus so appropriately inaugurated carried the original "Old Glory" into many harbors throughout the world and into even more during the next six years while Captain Driver sailed the seas. During one of his voyages into the Orient he had made a camphorwood sea chest, brass-bound and decorated with nailheads, in which he placed the original "Old Glory" when it was not floating at the masthead of his ship. And this flag had an even more thrilling later history than its early one.

In 1837 Captain Driver retired from the sea and went to Nashville, Tenn., to make his home, but when he sold his ship he did not sell "Old Glory." Safe in its camphorwood chest it went to Tennessee with him. On patriotic occasions and on his own birthday—St. Patrick's day, for he was born March 17, 1803—it was taken from the chest and flung to the breeze for all to see and to reverence. And Captain Driver invariably saluted it with these words, "My country, my flag—Old Glory!"

As the dispute between the North and South became more intense and the Civil war drew nearer and nearer, Captain Driver became increasingly unpopular with his neighbors in Nashville because of his outspoken devotion to his country and his flag. During the Presidential campaign "Old Glory" was displayed on a rope stretched from his home to a tree across the street but the bitterness of that campaign brought to Captain Driver's ears unmistakable hints that his flag might be stolen or destroyed, so he bought another flag for display and retired "Old Glory" once more to its camphorwood chest.

After the secession of Tennessee from the Union, the captain began to fear for safety of his flag at the hands of the Confederates. So he took it by night to the house of a Union sympathizer named Bailey and asked Mrs. Bailey and her daughters, Mary and Patience, to hide it for him so that it could not be found and destroyed if the Confederates searched his house. At the time Mary and Patience Bailey were making a comfort, padding it heavily with cotton, and thus suggested an ideal hiding place. So Captain Driver folded "Old Glory," placed it between the layers of cotton in the comfort where the Bailey girls tacked it in and sewed up the outside covering. Again at night Captain Driver took the comfort to his home and placed it in a large iron wash kettle in the attic of his home.

There "Old Glory" stayed until Union troops occupied Nashville in February, 1862. Immediately thereafter Captain Driver and a group of soldiers ripped open the comfort, took out the flag and hoisted it over the state capitol to the strains of "The Star-Spangled Banner," played by a regimental band. It remained there for hours, but so fearful was Captain Driver that his flag might even then be injured by a hostile hand that he stood guard over it day and night. In the morning "Old Glory" was taken down and replaced with another American flag. By this time it was very old, much worn and the captain feared that a strong wind would whip it to pieces.

After this "Old Glory" was always kept in the captain's house and late in his life he gave it to his daughter, Mrs. M. J. Roland of Nevada, where, so far as is known, it still is. In 1907 the flag had become so worn that Mrs. Roland placed it on a piece of sheeting and stitched it fast to the cloth to preserve it for future generations of the family. Captain Driver died March 2, 1886, and was buried in Old City cemetery in Nashville.

Just as it was a Yankee sea captain which gave to our flag its name of "Old Glory," so it was that another Yankee—a soldier, instead of a sailor, however—who took another "Old Glory" on one of the most romantic expeditions in our history. Bates was his name and he had served as color sergeant in the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts regiment during the Civil war. In 1872 Color Sergeant Bates had an idea, which he proceeded to put into effect in a dramatic fashion.

At that time there was much talk in this country of the hostility of Great Britain toward the United States. Determined to find out for himself whether this talk was fostered by politicians for their own selfish ends or was a genuine antipathy, Bates resolved to cross the Atlantic, start from the northern border of England and march to London bearing aloft an unfurled American flag just as he had done on the battlefields of 1861-65. His reception by the people of England would show whether or not there was any foundation for this talk of John Bull's hostility toward Uncle Sam.

Clad in his uniform of blue, Sergeant Bates on November 5—Guy Fawkes day and the anniversary of the Battle of Inkerman—left Edinburgh for Gretna Green. At Sark bridge on the border line between Scotland and England he unfurled "Old Glory" and stood beneath it with uncovered head. Then he started on his march. That evening he tramped into Carlisle where a group of commercial travelers at the Bush hotel gave him a hearty welcome. More than that; they sent word on ahead of his strange pilgrimage and when he came to the mining towns of Penrith and Shap, great crowds of miners were on hand to cheer him.

The warm welcome given Bates there was repeated in every place through which he traveled.

The London daily press gave much space to the American soldier on December 2. A dense mass packed the Guildhall yard, where a British sergeant was carrying the English standard. Bates was borne on the shoulders of men into the crowded Guildhall, and then back to the carriage, from which he made a speech before refurling his flag.

Bates' reception in London was the crowning touch to his pilgrimage. There was no longer any doubt of John Bull's friendliness toward Uncle Sam, at least so far as the common people of England were concerned.

Tells Tale of an Ocean Tragedy

Boy Relates How Marooned Comrades Perished on Island.

Paris.—The transport Chambord of the Messageries Maritimes, plying between islands of the South Seas and Indian ocean, and assigned to carry the Madagascar mail, slipped into Marseilles recently with one of the most tragic stories of the sea, a story of seven marooned fisherfolk, one being a woman, who gave birth to an unnourished babe.

Four slow and languishing deaths were caused by starvation and scurvy. The three survivors helplessly awaited the next to go when the long-promised relief ship arrived. The infant that perished counted five in the fatalities.

Youth Tells Story.

The story was told by Le Merdy Herdelan, nineteen, a Breton youth from Pont Aven. Three years ago a Parisian firm established a lobster cannery on the tiny island of St. Paul, one of those isolated, lost islands in the middle of the Indian ocean between Australia and Africa. Sturdy fishermen were brought from Pont Aven and Concarneau in Brittany.

At the beginning of 1930 hard times hit the cannery and three months later the company decided to withdraw its workmen, leaving seven volunteers to look after the material and to be taken off later by a relief ship. The band included young Herdelan Pulloch, a machinist; M. and Mme. Brunon; Quillizic and Huledut, fisherman, and a negro, Francois.

Life on the island was good enough until spring, when the necessary food was lacking. Fire had destroyed or soured most of the tinned goods. The water condensing apparatus was out of order and scurvy attacked the party, which was existing on penguins' eggs, rabbits, birds, shellfish and rainwater caught in the volcanic craters.

Dies as Comrades Watch.

Pulloch, the machinist, died first, from scurvy, and was buried in a shallow grave. Food of rabbit meat and penguins' eggs soon caused the end of M. Brunon, whose wife was prostrated. Her baby, born some weeks later, had died quickly. One day the negro, Francois, collapsed on the rocks. Finally Quillezic, a fisherman, endeavoring to catch some meaty fish in an improvised boat, was lost in sight of his comrades, his body, tortured with scurvy and beri-beri, having no resistance.

Three were left—Herledan, Mme. Brunon and Huledut. Mme. Brunon seemed only to wait to join her husband and child in the grave. The rabbits jumped about, penguins stood mournfully on the rocks and the three survivors moved about and talked like ghosts, fearing to eat that same awful food which brought scurvy. The youth of young Herledan probably kept him the strongest, though the tragedy showed in his melancholy face.

"What did you do when the relief ship finally came?" he was asked.

"I hardly remember," he said. "Fifty people came ashore. They brought food, supplies and machinery and they are going to rebuild the canning factory. Huledut and Mme. Brunon are staying there."

Flaw in Story Convicts Man as Wife Murderer

Whitehall, N. Y.—Convicted of murdering his pretty young wife while their baby daughter lay sleeping in her mother's arms, Thomas Marion, prominent young farmer, of near High Point, must serve twenty to thirty years in the state penitentiary.

Marion's conviction, which came despite his protestations that a negro bandit shot Mrs. Marion to death during a holdup, was attributed by defense attorneys and court attendants to one flaw in the young planter's story.

Marion claimed he had a firm grip on the bandit's pistol when the shot fatal to Mrs. Marion was fired.

This part of Marion's story, the prosecution averred, proved the falsity of his entire account of the tragedy.

The state introduced expert testimony to show that had Marion's hands been gripping the negro's pistol, powder marks would have been visible to those who talked to him a few minutes later.

Wyoming Turtle Death Puzzles U. S. Scientists

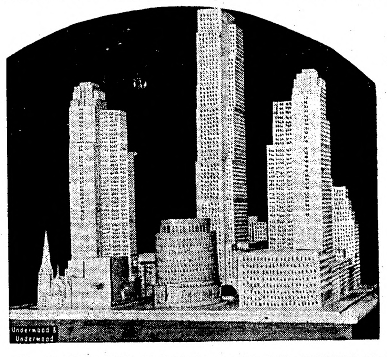
Washington.—What hit the turtles is one of the things Smithsonian institution excavators hope to discover in future examination of fossil fields of the Bridger Basin, Wyoming.

In its report recently published, the institution's fossil party describes a vast turtle death spot where one outcrop 50 feet long was composed almost exclusively of turtle shells side by side. What caused this wholesale and obviously sudden annihilation could not be learned.

Charles W. Gilmore, leader of the party, thought it might have been noxious gas, volcanic ash or perhaps a sudden flow of boiling water—all hinting at prehistoric upheavals in the Wyoming bad lands.

Crocodile skulls and an almost complete skeleton of the long extinct Hyrachyus, which is similar to a rhinoceros, were among the expedition's finds in Wyoming.

Model of "Radio City" for New York



The New York public got its first conception of the $250,000,000 "Radio City" when plans for the project, which is to occupy three blocks facing Fifth avenue, between Forty-eighth and Fifty-first streets, were shown in the offices of the engineers for the enterprise. The 50-story skyscraper group, which will be established through the interest of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is expected to be completed by 1934.

WESTERN BAD MEN LIKED ICE CREAM FRUIT DRINK

Gold Rush Druggist Pioneered in Development of Soda Concoctions.

New York.—Who invented the ice cream soda? Well, one of the pioneers in its development was a pioneer druggist of the gold-rush days. He served a mixture of heavy cream and fruit juice to the he-men who had flocked to California in search of the bright metal. And the forty-niners, who could swallow tumblersful of whisky without winking, liked it.

Justin Gates, Jr., was the druggist. He was the first graduate chemist to arrive in California, his grandson, Gates Hebbard, writes in the American Druggist. After the gold rush had abated a little Gates sold his fruit sirup and cream mixture at the state fair at Sacramento. It created a sensation. Years later the ice cream soda—a somewhat similar concoction—came along.

Gates saved many lives in the mining camps by fitting out 'traveling drug stores' and sending them into the gold regions, his grandson writes. The 'traveling drug stores' were wagons filled with drugs and medicines. There were four of them and a capable apothecary was in charge of each. The wagons covered hundreds of miles of territory. Few doctors in the gold regions were able to compound their own medicines and they came to rely upon the 'traveling drug stores.'

Some of the mining camps were so inaccessible that doctors rarely visited them. Gates therefore made up a number of family medicine chests which contained remedies for common complaints and directions for use. These the apothecaries left in the camps. Hundreds of sick men thus got medical aid which they would never have received had it not been for Gates' wagons.

Both Jaws Broken by Kicks of Mules

Courtland, Kan.—J. C. Smith, Jewell county farmer, had both his jaws cracked by the kicks of different mules.

Smith attempted to remove a nail from a mule's hoof. The mule kicked, the blow breaking the jaw and throwing him backward into the range of the other mule, who likewise let his hind foot fly out, cracking Smith's other jaw.

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon, to escape secular and religious tyranny, leave England in 1634, for the New World. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear.

CHAPTER IV

In Peril of the Hempen Rope

The little town was in a ferment, the like of which it would be hard to find in all its history. The best people agreed that if Robert had been the guilty one they would have been the less amazed. There were women, even those without the grace and charm of youth, who were saying: "The sleek, handsome, secret, villainous contriver! I would never have trusted myself with him a bow-shot from home in the night."

Sir Harry Vane went to the Brades' house soon after the hue and cry started. He found them crushed with sore astonishment and humiliation. Bess fell upon Sir Harry with a passionate plea.

"This is a lie—a cruel lie!" she declared. "I know it is a lie. You and my father must mount your horses and go and keep those fiends from harming him."

"I think that she is right," said the young nobleman. "We must go and do what we can for the boy."

As soon as the horses could be brought they mounted and rode away, each with sword and pistol. The hue and cry had crossed the neck and split, at a fork in the main path to the fresh-water river, about half a mile to the west. A part of the howling mob held this path. Mr. Brade made his way through them while Sir Harry headed the caravan that went up toward the clearing of Heydon and Heathers. Soon the dogs stopped. Led by a keen-nosed Spanish hound they made off in the woods, Sir Harry following, for it was high ground. They were not long in finding William.

"You are a good friend to come out to find me," said he. "Sir Harry, you never looked better. I have been lost since midnight when I strayed from the path. It has not worried me. I slept until awakened not long ago by a great noise."

He now observed the trouble in the face of his friend.

"Have you bad news?" he asked.

Sir Harry review the damning testimony produced in court.

William turned pale, his friend put his arm around him fearing that he would fall. William stood apart, straightened and looked down in deep thought.

"Old friend, what is the truth of this matter?" Sir Harry asked.

The younger one answered with trembling lips. "The truth is, I'm done for."

He stood a moment picking at the small mustache on his lip and saying: "I'm sorry for myself—but—mostly for others. I will go and face the court and take what is coming."

"You ride the horse," said Sir Harry. "I will walk by the bridle. Near the path I will mount behind you. We will slip around that pack of ruffians."

The shouting and horn blowing served to guide them toward the path. Some twenty rods away they veered around the mob and came out below it and hastened to the courthouse. Elizabeth Brade and her mother met them at the door. The girl seized the hand of her lover, saying: "Dear one! I know it is not true. What has happened to you?"

William was like one in a daze. He leaned upon his friend. His lips trembled. He looked at the girl and spoke—a riddle that passed from lip to lip, and save for one possible solution, it would have burned her brain to ashes.

"Bess, this is the hardest part of it. Remember that whatever else may be said of me, I am no coward. God help you to stand and, chiefly, to understand what is coming."

News of the arrival of the guilty man reached the magistrates. A constable came out. He escorted the prisoner to the bar. The court discontinued the affairs it had been discussing. In a low solemn tone, that showed at times a sign of emotion, the kindly Governor Winthrop addressed the young man. He read aloud the evidence of the housekeeper, of Peggy Weld and her brother Henry who had talked with Robert at the Governor's house, of Hachaliah Grout, the constable, of Mabel Hartley, sometime a servant in William's house. He announced to the prisoner that the court was ready to hear any evidence he could present in his own behalf. His friends on the bench and among the spectators were shocked and amazed by his answer.

"Your honor, I have no evidence to offer. I submit to the mercy of the court."

"Where is your friend—Robert Heathers?"

"I do not know."

"He is not to be found within the jurisdiction of this court."

The governor conferred a moment with his assistants. He spoke again to the prisoner.

"William Heydon, since a time far back in the ages, even before God gave his commandments to the children of men, the marriage tie has been the mainstay of civilization. Unless it be upheld men and women lose their respect for God and man and become as the beasts of the field. They lose the love of all good things and soon even their own children are like unto the weanlings of the flock, indifferent to father and mother. With us, the home is the foundation of the state. Its respect for law, its steadfast virtue, is our main dependence. In a new land where to the ill-schooled law is merely a menace, and the thoughtless exceed the wise in number, we must be severe with all disorders tending to corrupt the life of the family, otherwise our little commonwealth would soon crumble into the dust. You shall be taken hence to the prison and be there confined until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock, when you will be brought to this court to make a formal plea of guilty and to receive its sentence."

There was much loss of sleep in Boston that night. Early in the evening Sir Harry Vane was at the Brades'. It was a shocked and dejected family group. Elizabeth had solved the riddle in William's words to her own satisfaction. She quoted the first sentence:

"'Remember that whatever else may be said of me I am no coward.' Now the man who was with the woman was a coward. He ran away. He was Robert Heathers. He is still running.

"Now take the other words: 'God help you to stand and to understand what is coming.'

"The woman is in love with Robert. They have met many times. She adores him. That is why she puts the crime on Will, for whom she has a spite. She resented his cleaning the house of her. Perchance he had begun to suspect the secret relations between her and his friend.

"But there is more in this word 'understand.' We are to understand that he is a gentleman. That he would not put the crime on his best friend even to save himself."

"In all this you are quite right," said Sir Harry. "We must remember that these boys have been friends, inseparable as the swans of Juno. They were like brothers. Yet you have not probed to the bone of this matter of understanding. William has a brain that is never idle. It is swift to see to the end of a problem. Suppose he were to set up a defense and say: 'It was not I. It must have been Robert, for I have long suspected guilty relations between him and this woman.' It would be like blowing against the wind. The case against William is perfect—the woman, the constable, the coat, the discovery of the prisoner in a lonely part of the forest, with no explanation of his being there which the court will believe."

"The coat was undoubtedly that of William Heydon," said Mr. Brade.

Bess answered quickly: "The boys often wore each other's clothes. William's best coat was less damaged by the sea and Robert was going to meet a grand lady at the house of the governor."

She arose, saying: "I really must go to the prison and assure him of our love and faith in his honor."

Her father spoke out firmly then. "I forbid you to go there. Whether he be guilty or innocent, he is disgraced. You must put him out of your heart."

"I can die but I cannot put him out of my heart," the girl answered, a look of despair in her face. "If he dies I shall find my way out of this evil world."

Sir Harry answered her: "You broken lily! I would I had the cunning hand to mend and refresh you. I am going now to plead for the boy in a special session of the court in Dudley's house. It will meet at seven o'clock. God help me with those flinty, indurated Puritans. I hope that I can save the boy—a task for which I am prepared the better by your understanding."

He hurried to the house of Thomas Dudley. The grave-faced magistrates and their assistants had been discussing the case. All save Governor Winthrop were in favor of the pain of death for the prisoner. Dudley so informed the young man, who took issue with the court squarely in these words:

"Gentlemen, you cannot take this man's life."

"Why can we not?" Endicott asked, his ire rising. "Have we not abundant proof?"

"Oh what?" Sir Harry inquired.

"Of adultery."

"Well, gentlemen, let us assume that the crime is proved. I can prove that Robert often wore William's coat. The young men resemble each other closely. How in the feeble light of that lantern could the woman or the constable have been sure of the man?

"The woman has today admitted to me that she may have been wrong. I ask why has Robert Heathers fled from the jurisdiction of this court? William Heydon did not flee. On his way to his clearing in the dark he wandered from the path and was lost within a mile or so of this courthouse.

"Who of you with the life of a human being in his hands—and that the life of a citizen hitherto loved and respected—would venture to say on this evidence that he is the guilty man? At least is there not a serious doubt of it and are you not bound to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt?

"Since he was a lad in school I have known this William Heydon—the son of an English gentleman of the best breed and schooling. I knew him as a youth of the noblest ideals of conduct, and I declare, solemnly, that I think you have the wrong man by the ear."

"Do you think that Robert Heathers is the adulterer?" Winthrop asked.

"I do, and for this reason. The woman was in love with Robert. She disliked William, who had dismissed her. For these reasons she swore falsely. It appears also that Robert often wore William's best coat, his own having been soiled at sea. I think that he wore it that night. William has neither confessed nor denied his guilt. He simply asks for the mercy of the court. The case looks perfect to him but not to me. In my judgment, the identification of the constable is of slight importance considering how closely the boys resemble each other, the excitement and the dim light. William has done what any well-bred youth would be likely to do. He refuses to put the crime on his friend. He might refuse even if the case against him were not hopeless. Robert ran away. William did not. Action should be deferred until Robert Heathers can be brought within the jurisdiction of this court."

Sir Harry bade them good night. He had impressed without convincing those solemn men. Until near midnight they argued with one another, striving to discover the will of God in this business. Winthrop favored certain vital contentions of Sir Harry Vane. They agreed upon their course of action and went to their homes.

At eight-thirty next morning the court convened. Long before that hour its seats and aisles were filled with the best people of Boston and a crowd was at the doors. A little before ten the constables came in with their prisoner.

Koreans Cling to Old Customs in Marriage

It is the rule in Korea for a newly wedded woman to enter the family of her husband, though in a few cases the man makes his home with her family. Marriage cannot be contracted between near relatives. Monogamy, taught by Confucius, has been observed from ancient times, but as the chief object of marriage was the perpetuation of the family, concubinage was formerly recognized when a marriage proved childless. The marriage of young people is usually arranged by their guardians without regard to their wishes, but there is a tendency to respect the will of the parties themselves. Until the day of marriage the engaged couple do not meet and have probably never before seen each other. A wedding is always conducted at the bride's home and after that the bridegroom takes her to his house. In the days of the Korean government the prescribed age of marriage for males was 15 and for females 14, although many males were married younger. Since 1915 no marriage of a male under 17 or of a female under 15 is legal.

Exit the Ghost

The tourist was making a tour of inspection of the very ancient-looking hostel.

"Charming old place," he mentioned to his companion, a regular boarder.

"Yes," mumbled the other, steering his head past an old oak beam just in time to save a nasty bruise.

"They say it's haunted," went on the tourist enthusiastically.

"Yes, it used to be," replied the regular boarder, "but the management raised the prices so high the ghost left."—London Answers

Lonely Ditch-Digger Given Fortune

By JANNIS PARKER

(©, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

LISETTE looked at the chill gray current and hugged Henri's arm more tightly. A stiff gust of wind swirled around her and through her thin clothing. Her coat didn't feel as heavy as she thought it would when she first saw it in the store window. With her free hand she drew it more closely around her. Some day Henri would buy her a coat, such a coat! The eyes of the other midinettes would drop out.

"Liza, dear!" Henri would sometimes say, calling her attention to the costumes of the smart women that passed them. "That hat! You would look charming in it!" And Lisette would memorize every line, ribbon, or tiny quill and late that night the lamp's rays would fall on her tawny hair as she bent over a piece of buckram, twisting and stitching it; or as she ran her finger caressingly along the upturned brim of a hat she had just fashioned from an old piece of velvet.

"Lisa, oh that gray dress! It was created for you, my dear. No! On the tall girl, Lisa! The one with the panels!" And when Lisette had saved enough she would go to the big department store and, with her heart pounding, in very dignified tones she would ask the sales girl if they had anything in a soft, gray crêpe.

She felt hungry, but Henri didn't seem to need food. His studies fed him. How often he had tried to explain to her about the Sorbonne, but to her it was a dreadful university that ate up everything he had. To him it meant something bigger, finer, a home for them both.

Looking up at him now, as he clasped her arm more firmly, his straight brown hair with its sheen made her forget the low, scurrying clouds overhead, and that they were watching every centime for Henri's courses and their marriage.

Henri slackened his steps at the corner. "Lisette, dear, this is where I leave you. I am already twenty minutes late."

Lisette looked carefully up and down the almost deserted street. No one was in sight save an old laborer, digging in the gutter. Then she stood very nearly on the tips of her toes and held her face up to Henri's.

"You will be there, tonight, Henri?"

"I will be there, Lisa, I must hurry!"

Lisette's eyes darted away to a dreary-looking somber coach, drawn by two tired horses.

"Henri, look! A hearse, unaccompanied! Come, we will have to follow it. That anyone should allow the poor soul to go to his last resting place alone! Never, in France, have I heard of such a thing! Come, Henri!" She grasped his hand but he stood riveted to the pavement.

"Come, Henri, don't stand there! Would you have it go to the cemetery alone? Look, if we don't go perhaps no one will. The street is almost deserted!"

She stamped her tiny foot. "Mon dieu, Henri, it is almost out of sight!"

"Lisa, have I not told you that I am already late for my class?"

"But Henri, the professor you say he is such a nice man—"

"Nevertheless, he will give the examination and I must pass it."

"Henri, you'll pass, you always do."

"Yes, but I must first take it."

"But Henri—"

"Even now, Lisa, you should be back at the shop. Madame will be in a frenzy."

"Madame is always in a frenzy."

"That is unfortunately her privilege. And Lisa, she will not feel inclined towards paying you that you may accompany stray hearses around the country and you will have to buy your own dresses forever if you do not let me finish my studies that I may earn."

Lisette's eyes wistfully followed the slow carriage. "The poor man—"

"Is dead. We are alive. It will be no great loss to him if he goes alone. Is it our fault that he has no friends? Lisa, we have no time to devote to such customs. We cannot afford it. Let some one else. There are plenty of people in Paris."

He held her chin up and gazed down into her big eyes. "Don't look so sad, little one. Look Lisa! Everything is splendid! The ditch digger, see, he has dropped his shovel! He is following. He fumbles his cap in his hands! There, are you happy? Let me see you smile!"

Lisette looked up the street. Henri was right. With slow steps the old man was limping along. She could see the wind lift the thin gray strands of his hair.

The next day at lunch time Lisette sat on a high stool, munching a croissant and trying to read the paper amid the roar and clamor of the work room. Her eyes roamed leisurely over the page. As they fell on heavy print she stopped chewing. "Ditch-Digger Wins Fortune." She reread it three times. So the man had been rich, a miser. "Monsieur Leval, having no relatives and apparently no friends, stated in his will that all his possessions be left to whomsoever would accompany his hearse to the cemetery. To Pierre Duval, an elderly laborer, goes—"

Lisette slid from the stool, folded the paper and put it under her arm. She thought a moment, unfolded it, and tore it up. Of what good to tell Henri? She hoped he had passed his examination.

Dog's Thanks Expressed in Time-Honored Way

Not all tramps are loafers. Some are good and noble characters. One received a notable distinction here because he saved a man's life. A corpulent general made an address, and bestowed this honor on him in recognition of a deed so brave, sagacious and humane.

This particular hobo happened to be a terrier. One might well say he is a super-Dobermann. When a hotel-keeper's son, Robert Lohnsack, of Hohenwutzen, unable to swim, fell into the fish-pond at the Bad-Frienwalde, the dog promptly sprang in and dragged him to the bank. The German Animal Protective league heard of it, and decided at once that the terrier should receive a special mark of their esteem, and presented him with a blue and yellow enamel collar, to which was affixed a golden plate bearing the arms of the league, and also the engraved words, "To the Life Saver." The master of ceremonies, General von Kuhlwein, delivered the speech. The dog listened with becoming modesty, and thanked his appreciators briefly in the language of his forefathers.—Berliner Tageblatt.

Backfiring in Warfare

A device that enables pilots of single-seater fighting airplanes to fire accurately at targets behind them has just been invented by a twenty-year-old Oxford engineer.

It consists of a remarkably clever arrangement of reflex mirror sights connected with a gun trained to the rear of the machine. Thus, the pilot can get an aim on any target in his rear simply by looking into a mirror on his instrument board.

A mirror beneath the airplane reflects—just as a periscope does—the view of the target in the rear onto another reflex mirror mounted on top of the cockpit. This reflects the picture to the sighting mirror—which is electrically heated and wiped to counteract bad atmospheric conditions. As soon as the target appears on this mirror the pilot opens fire.

Some Tall Men

"In the Bible we read that the bedstead of Og, king of Basham, was about 16½ feet long; he lived 1451 B. C.," records Charles Duff in "This Human Nature." "Goliath of Gath, who was killed in a duel with David, was not far off 10 feet in height. Pliny tells us, 'The tallest man that hath been seen in our age was one named Gabara, who in the days of Claudius was brought out of Arabia; he was nearly 10 feet high.' The biggest man in the Twentieth century was Machnow, the Russian, who at the age of twenty-three years was 9 feet 8 inches, and weighed 448 pounds."

Luxuries for Hunters

Johnny Jones, big game guide in the Yukon, carries a bathtub and a French cook, among other things, when showing wealthy tourists where to bag game. Jones makes thirty to sixty-day trips into the wilds. His headquarters are at Skagway, where he keeps a string of forty horses. "A guide to be successful should arrange the best for his parties," Jones said. "Sportsmen make the trip with me usually in pairs, never more than five. I take a complete outfit for camp convenience, including a stove and bathtub. French cooks are the best, and I always have one along."

Slept Through It

Host—Well, little lady, did you have a good night?

Small Visitor—I don't know. I was asleep all the time.

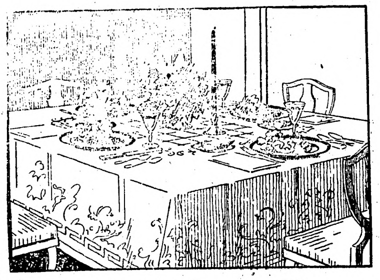
A Dollar Dinner for Four



MONEY doesn't grow on bushes, it's true—but it grows and thrives in the bank. The increasing popularity of "dollar dinners" among housewives throughout this country testifies to the fact that American women, long accused of being extravagant in matters of food, are becoming thrifty. When you serve a dollar dinner for four persons, you are saving money which can grow for you in your bank—and if your dinner is carefully planned it will rival a far more expensive dinner.

Here is a dinner designed to please both the palate and the pocket-book. Be sure that it is served as attractively as your more elaborate dinners, and it will be equally inviting.

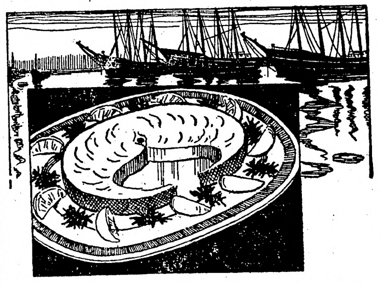
Corn Sticks: Mix and sift the following dry ingredients: one and one-fourth cups flour, one cup yellow cornmeal, four and one-half teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt, one-half cup sugar. Add three-fourths cup diluted evaporated milk and two well-beaten eggs. Add one-fourth cup melted butter. Pour into well-greased corn stick pans and bake in a hot oven—400 degrees—for about 20 to 25 minutes. Serve hot and spread with butter.*

Five Cents a Portion



PORTERHOUSE steak costs about thirty-five cents a portion. For as little as five cents a portion, one can eat one of the sea's greatest delicacies, and one of Nature's best health foods — canned salmon. You see the familiar can so often, because it is so much in demand and every grocer carries it—that it is only occasionally that you think of the distant land from which this fish comes to you at so slight a cost.

The salmon is a dweller in deep seas that murmur up long inland passages which extend for thousands of miles bearing millions upon millions of homing salmon in their fathomless, icy waters. Outside these passages miles of netting looped into huge traps await them; fleets of ships and tenders, hurrying to and fro with tackle, workers and supplies await them; huge buildings vibrating with the whir of machinery to pack the rich catch with incredible speed await them; and ships and trains carry the canned product to all parts of the world.

Serve Salmon Often

When you open the can, the firm pink fish with the clean inviting smell tempts you to use it just as it is—and it is delicious in just this refreshing form. But housewives who know the food value of the fish have devised many salmon dishes, soups, salad, creamed salmon on toast, salmon loaf and salmon combination main dishes.

Salmon is particularly rich in protein and fish oils. Dr. E. V. McCollum states that many foods are lacking in Vitamin D, important to insure the normal development of bones and to prevent rickets. This vitamin is comparatively abundant in fish oils.*

ELECTRIC SERVICE

WAITING FOR YOU

The evening after the picture show or the auto ride you return home and turn on the electric light. It has been waiting there for you—ready to respond instantly to any demand you make upon it.

Today, tomorrow and the next day you will call upon your electric company for instant service. You will give no warning as to when you will want it nor how much of it you will want. Yet, the service will be there, plenty of it, at all times, ready for use in large or small quantities, as you see fit, and to be paid for after you use it, not before.

This kind of service is possible only through the operation of large power plants inter-connected by substantial transmission lines.

And back of it all there is the desire on the part of your Electric Company to render you the best possible service at the lowest possible cost.

Have you ever thought of it in this way?

Club Awards Are Announced

To stimulate the greater use of and consumption of dairy products and the economical farm production of quality milk and cream, the Red River Valley Dairymen's Association through its secretary, C. M. Pesek of Crookston, has announced their awards for boys calf club work and dairy judging contest, 4-H club dairy demonstration contests, adult dairy judging contest, and a boys dairy herd management project for seventeen counties of the Red River Valley in Northwestern part of Minnesota.

The pronouncement is in line with Governor Floyd B. Olson's announcement proclaming this week as "Dairy Week" in which he states in part "Immediate and substantial relief to the dairy industry would follow if the people of Minnesota would increase their consumption of milk, butter, cheese, ice cream and other dairy products".

"The health value of dairy products in the human diet has now been established beyond all doubt. Wide studies and surveys have shown that the average person does not consume enough dairy products for best health requirements."

In the advanced dairy calf club work, the milk is to be weighed, tested, records kept of milk, feed, butterfat and costs. The winner is to be determined from the completeness of the record and economical production. Previous club records will also be considered. The awards are. 1st prize—$50.00 scholarship to any Agricultural school or College and 2nd prize is a $30.00 scholarship to either institution.

Ten honorable mention medals also will be awarded. For additional information entrants are requested to write H. A. Pflughoeft, Northwest School of Agriculture at Crookston.

In the boys and girls dairy judging contest, the ten best teams in the valley will receive free railroad fare to the Red River Valley Winter Shows at Crookston and the winning team will receive a silver trophy.

The 4-H Dairy Demonstration contest is to be held on the following subjects: Use and consumption of dairy products; Production of high quality milk and cream, and Mixing and Economical dairy rations. The five best teams will receive free fare to and from the Red River Valley winter shows as well as one day's expenses. The winning team will receive a big banner.

The adult dairy judging teams will compete for a silver trophy and the highest scoring individual will receive an appropriate medal.

In the boys Dairy Herd Management project conducted by R. J. Christgau of the Northwest School, the winning boy will receive free tuition for three months at the Northwest school. All interested should get in touch with local 4-H club leaders, county agents or club agent, H. A. Pflughoeft of the Northwest School, Crookston.

Lutheran Assembly

One of the largest gatherings ever held in the vicinity takes place when Lutherans will meet at Thief River Falls on Sunday June 28th, for what is called the Northwest Lutheran Assembly. Congregations of the Thief River Falls Circuit are omitting services for the day to take part in the forenoon joint service which will be held at Squaw Point, just off Eight Street, east and north of the River Bridge.

Rev. T. F. Gullixson, president of Lutheran Theological Seminary and vice president of The Norwegian Lutheran Church of America, will be the speaker. He will preach at the open-air service at 11 o'clock a. m. and give the main addres in the afternoon at 2:30. Special music by a male chorus under the direction of Mr. Robert Lund will be furnished at both sessions.

Two stands will be erected on the grounds, a coffee and lunch stand and a refreshment stand.

The question of making the Assembly an annual affair will come up for consideration and action at the afternoon session.

The committee in charge of arrangements includes Rev. R. M. Fjelstad, chairman; Dr. O. F. Mellby, Dr. A. E. Jacobson, Martin Erickson and A. J. Olson.

Carlson's Summer Sale

The Carlson Mercantile Company owners of five up to date stores along this line, are this week announcing their low price Summer Sale to begin today and lasting for twelve days, closing in the evening, July 3.

They have just returned from market with thousands of dollars worth of new merchandise and are now offering them to the people in this community at the lowest prices they have had in 15 years. If you don't think so, read their ad in this issue -- visit their store and check up on the merchandise and you will be surprised at the wonderful values presented at this summer sale.

They have established a buyer's market right here for the benefit of all and, you should not pass up the opportunity of coming to Holt and share in these great savings.

Holt Drops One, Wins One

Sunday the Holt baseball boys sailed down to defeat at the hands of the Gatzke aggregation under a deluge of hits. After the storm was over, it was found that the score was 10-5, which is not as bad as some drubbings we have seen.

Wednesday night the locals gave vent to their feelings when they downed Newfolden on the local diamond. Myhrer, the opposing pitcher, was hit freely, and this, coupled with a few errors, gave Holt a 10-1 lead at the end of the fifth inning.

In the sixth, however, Newfolden got partial revenge with six runs in a row. The damage was not enough to threaten Holt's lead. In our half of the sixth we were not able to do any more than get a man to third base, where he stayed.

The score, 7-10, seemed likely to be upset in the first of the seventh, but the worst they could do was to run in a pair of scores, which left Holt at the big end of the 9-10 tally.

The score by innings:

Newfolden	0 0 1 0 0 6	2—9
Holt	3 3 1 0 3 0	x—10

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon, to escape secular and religious tyranny, leave England in 1634 for the New World. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear. Heydon is apprehended and brought into court.

Winthrop proclaimed the will of the court, saying:

"William Heydon, the evidence of a grave violation of the law is conclusive. You have offered no defense. Therefore, your guilt is not in question, although you have not as yet pleaded. Before the court takes further action it has decided to await the return of a material witness. Meanwhile you will be confined in the prison house until the court sends for you. I warn you to prepare yourself to suffer the extreme penalty of the law within a month from this day."

Mabel Hartley was ill in bed and unable to stand on her feet.

Severe as were the words of the governor, the Brades and all other good people—save Dudley and Endicott, who had voted for immediate death—were relieved by the respite.

That evening Peggy Weld and her lover had their first quarrel. Rosewell was a young engineer who had come that year from Cambridge and gone to work in the growing colony. He was a big, brawny, handsome youth of twenty-three, with dark hair and eyes. Unlike Peggy he was of a proud and serious temper. He had joined the church and won the respect and confidence of all the great men. His sense of humor was undeveloped. Her free, unterrified, original opinions often shocked him. "She is young," he said to himself. "I can change her course with a little steering." It was the splendid physical endowment of Peggy Weld that chiefly attracted him. They had been discussing the case of William Heydon. This was her query:

"Do you think that anyone would enjoy a sinless world? Doctor Cotton would have to stop preaching and you would have no more fortifications to build. The rich would give to the poor and the only ones who worried would be the men who had something. In a little while no one would have anything. Even virtue would be spineless. We are human beings, and if we were perfect we would not be here."

"Would you have us wink at adultery?" Rosewell asked.

"No, but the Roundheads should be at least as merciful as the Lord. We are not ancient Hebrews living three thousand years ago. I hate your court. Those men should be left alone here to sing psalms and preach sermons to one another until they were dead."

"You're a rebel cynic," said Rosewell with a frown.

"I'm just an English human being and I claim the right to speak my mind."

"Your talk is indiscreet. Things are different in New England."

With some feeling she continued: "I demand the right to be sincere even in New England. I am as I am and if you do not like me I could be content."

Rosewell, who was rather fond of himself, was out of patience. His answer came quickly:

"I hope that you could not be content with Robert Heathers of whom you have had so much to say."

"With Robert Heathers? Indeed I think that I could. He is a gentleman and I like him in spite of all the gossip."

In a temper he picked up his hat, bowed and left her.

Peggy and her brother went to the Brades'. While they were doing what they could to comfort the stricken family, Sir Harry arrived with important news. The night of the crime Todkill had left the town in his canoe. The tavern ship was in the harbor. It was going out with the tide at midnight and up the coast among the fishermen. Men passing the ship in a pinnace about eleven-thirty saw a canoe, with two men aboard, coming alongside the anchored ship. In the moonlight they were clearly visible.

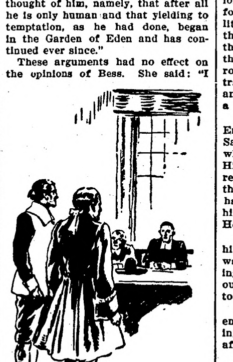
"Robert Heathers and his friend Todkill!" Bess exclaimed. "We must find them and get the rope on the right neck."

Peggy Weld went to Bess and kissed her and said: "We both have a bit of old Eve in us. Let us not so hard things of either boy. Whether it was one or the other who did it, I have a heart full of sympathy for him."

Bess answered: "But Robert ran away like a coward and left the woman and my lover to suffer disgrace and death alone."

"It is time that some one spoke up for Robert Heathers," said Peggy. "He is my friend and I cannot any longer be silent. It is easy to convict him when he cannot speak for himself. But there is not a feather's weight of evidence against him. Why did he run away? I think that this theory is as reasonable as any. If William had come home in a panic and confessed that he had been caught with a pretty wench, what would Robert have done? Well, he would have had to witness against his friend or commit perjury. Would he not have run away to escape the call of the court? Dear Bess, it is easy for one's judgment to be warped in the heat of her affection. I have been thinking of what William said to you. When he said that he was no coward did he not wish to have you remember that he would take his punishment like a man? In his wish that you would understand, does it mean anything more than his hope that a great truth would temper your thought of him, namely, that after all he is only human and that yielding to temptation, as he had done, began in the Garden of Eden and has continued ever since."

These arguments had no effect on the opinions of Bess. She said: "I know William as you do not—as you never could know him. He has a great soul."



"William Heydon, the Evidence of a Grave Violation of the Law Is Conclusive."

"Well, great souls have yielded to temptation," Peggy answered.

Harry Vane had listened with interest to these arguments. He said:

"I have more news and I think that you should both hear it. I sat for an hour by the bedside of Mabel Hartley. She admitted that she might have been in error in the identification of her paramour. She did not see his face even by the light of the constable's lantern."

"But she must have had an appointment," said Peggy.

"She says that she had no appointment."

"Poor woman!" Peggy exclaimed. "I am not so sinless that I have no sympathy for her. Women always get the worst of it. We have moved to a strange world where laws are made for saints and not for human beings. Enforced sanctity is a fright to me."

"It's only because you are accustomed to be favored by the law," said Sir Harry. "In England we hang for stealing. That catches the poor man. Here they hang for offenses that catch the rich as well as the poor. In America the gentleman is on the same footing as the fishmonger. In England adultery increases as you ascend the social scale. It has become a matter of grave concern in all the Old world."

Roswell Brade said: "We shall know the truth soon. The court is sending for Robert Heathers. As soon as he comes we shall see our way."

Young Sir Harry took the hand of the Lady Bess, saying:

"This deep trouble gives to your face a radiance curious and yet beautiful. I have never seen a face more fair to look upon. It should not be spoiled with too much grieving. Before you leave us here is more hopeful news for you. I have had a long talk with the constable, Mr. Hachaliah Grout. He, too, has admitted that he might have erred in his identification, in view of the fact that the young men are alike in height, weight and color. He admits that his judgment as to the identity of the man had been more or less influenced by the discovery of the coat. I have put the court in a quandary. Nothing will be done until Robert returns. They are sending an officer to find him."

"Thank you," said Bess. "You will know in time that my William is not the guilty man."

With that the girl left them. Her mother followed her to her room. The Lady Bess was depressed and in need of comfort. It may be that some "horseless courier of the air" had came to her from the lonely William on his bed of straw in the prison house.

CHAPTER V

Mr. John Samp, Constable, Finds Amos Todkill

Next day a constable with an able seaman set out in a shallop to find Robert Heathers. The colony had a long wait for news of them. They found the tavern ship at anchor in a little harbor far up the coast. More than a score of fishermen, including the infamous Thomas Wannerton and the pirate Dixie Bull, thronged its taproom and decks in a wild spree. They traded fish and furs for beer and bread and meal and clothing and kill-devil, a local name for strong water.

The constable was a fat blustering Englishman of the name of John Samp, with red hair and mutton-chop whiskers and the paunch of an ox. His large weathered face had the lusty redness of raw beef. His belt was like the middle hoop on a hogshead. He had a thick bovine neck, bare to his breast, and a shrewd intelligence. He was able to read and write.

Amos Todkill saw and recognized him as he neared the ship when night was falling. He ran to Robert, saying: "Go over the starboard side into our canoe and pull off a bit and lie to within hail till ye hear my whistle."

The two were prepared for all emergencies. Amos went to the landing stair and met Mr. Samp puffing after his climb.

He took the hand of the constable and said:

"John, my eyes are glad. What news have you?"

Samp answered: "News! Must I bring news to you? Well, then, there are fewer fish in the sea than when I set sail on it."

"'Good luck is fond o' good company," said Todkill.

"Also my belly is full o' emptiness. There's news for you."

"Come, let us drain a cup or two."

They could scarcely hear each other among the noisy, jolly seamen who were singing and shouting and arguing on the deck. Some were engaged in feats of strength.

"What side o' hell is this?" Samp asked as they made their way to the taproom. His face bore a look of overwhelming gravity.

"The north side! Not often as hot as now. They're a lot o' roysterin' good fellows. Be sociable and roly-poly with 'em and ye have no trouble. They're in the midst o' a plenty that they see none too frequent."

Samp looked around him. In a moment he said:

"They're like cattle in a cornfield. It puts me in mind o' Morton's Merrymount. As the Lord's my savior I never had such a thirst on me! Our beer give out yesterday and our water today."

"It's a leaky keg that goes to sea," said Amos. "Here's to fair winds!"

They drained three cups and then another. The last had a baptism of strong water.

"My heart is in the little town," said Amos. "Tell me what has happened there."

The constable was growing dignified and philosophical. His native cunning was now a bit diluted. His gravity deepened as he answered:

"I reckon you know as well as I 'bout that woman trouble in the pine thicket."

"As God's my witness—not a quintain."

"You can lie like Satan and look like a lamb just dropped. The woman swore it to Will Heydon. A coat found in the briars had a letter o' his in its pocket. The hue and cry come on him hiding in the wood. He is in prison. It's likely he'll wear the rope necktie. They have sent me here to get Robert Heathers. The case is stout ag'in young Heydon. Robert has nothin' to fear. Why should he break his neck runnin' away? If he's got any sense in his mazzard he'll go back with me. The court needs his testimony."

Quaint Rental Payment for English Freeholds

The ancient ceremony of rendering quit-rent services by the city of London took place before the king's remembrancer, Sir G. A. Bonner, at the Law Courts building recently. One of the services is in respect of a piece of land—the location of which cannot today be identified — called "The Moors," near Bridgnorth, Shropshire. The other is by "the tenants and occupiers of a tenement called 'The Forge,'"—on a piece of land once used by the Knights Templar for their tournaments and now covered by the Law Courts building. The ceremony dates back more than 700 years, when rents were paid in kind instead of in cash. The city solicitor rendered service in respect of "The Moors" by cutting two small bundles of faggots with a hatchet and a bill-hook. Thereafter, he counted out, one by one, six horse shoes and 61 nails in respect of "The Forge."

Good Library System

A novel system for promoting student reading of good literature is used by the Portland (Maine) public library. Books are sent to every school in the city, one book to each pupil, and interchanged until every pupil has read every book. Last year more than 900 books had a circulation of 75,000.

There are many who detest being in authority. They dislike to drive others.

THE MOST POPULAR GIRL IN TOWN

By FANNIE HURST

It WAS one of those situations, which, beginning the size of a pea, gathered moss at such an astonishingly rapid rate that presently all those connected with it were aghast at the magnitude of what they had done.

The Midtown Gazette, on which young Tom Powell was a reporter and to which Miss Amy Stricker subscribed, had started a popularity contest, the winning young lady to be the fortunate recipient of a tour around the world.

Of course, off-hand, one would have told you that Amy Stricker, so blond in her beauty, so bland in her blue-eyedness, so tender in the springtime quality of her youth, was the most popular girl in town. But popularity in the town of Orlando was one thing and popularity in a state which contained at least six cities of far greater population and size was another. In any event, before the township of Orlando realized it and with interest and competition running high, here was little Amy Stricker, nineteen, assistant librarian in the town's somewhat makeshift library, piling up votes in a fashion that flabbergasted and delighted the amazed and amused coupon clippers.

Of course, the fine hand of Tom Powell was to be detected behind much of the activity. From the moment that the Midtown Gazette announced its policy of staging the conspicuous and dramatic contest, this young fellow, alert, up-and-coming and full of the fine fettle of young journalism, carried on his campaign for placing the victory in the hands of his lovely fiancee, Miss Amy Stricker.

For three months, with comparatively no local competition, but with dangerous runners-up from the larger cities of the state, the war for popularity waged and circulation climbed. Miss Stricker's little desk at the library became the mecca of turbulent, coupon-clipping scenes. The little frame house on Ludlow street, where she lived with a married sister, sharing a tiny room with two half-grown nieces, was electric with excitement. In fact, the only calm aspect of this frenzied fight for the spectacular reward was the small, beautiful blond figure of Amy Stricker. She was as radiant as a lovely morning, her blue eyes never bluer, her smile never whiter. They said of her locally that she was a Mary Pickford, at Mary's zenith.

Youngsters adored her and followed her in little clumps. Old ladies toddled to the library for the benefit of the gentle manner she had with them. Amy had more beaus than there were chairs in the Ludlow street house to accommodate them. Tom Powell, who had worked his way through Northwestern university, was regarded the luckiest fellow in town. He wanted Amy to be the luckiest girl in town.

On the day of Amy's victory of eight thousand votes over her closest competitor, the town went wild. It was a miniature Lindbergh day. Factories and business houses blew their midday whistles and business was literally suspended for the hour that Amy Stricker, mounted on a paper float, rode through the town, bowing her sweet acknowledgments to the plaudits of crowds that were almost entirely composed of men, women and children with whom she had grown up.

No royal bride was ever more pompously prepared for ceremony than Amy in those weeks preceding her departure for the first lap of her ninety-day tour of the world. She was the community's interest, the community's pride, the community's responsibility. Ladies' societies met for the sole purpose of sewing Amy's traveling things. Local shops vied with one another in supplying Miss U. S. A. with paraphernalia. Tom Powell worked his eager hands to the bone, so to speak, seeing to it that the whole general picture was one of magnitude and scope worthy of his fiancee.

And then there entered into this picture aspects of the human equation which were to shock and disappoint the community beyond anything that had ever happened in its midst. A momentary shock, it is true, which later was to be superseded by a homely kind of feeling of affection for the misdemeanor of which Miss Stricker and Mr. Powell had been guilty.

Two weeks before Amy's contemplated departure on a flower-decked, bunting-draped train, Tom Powell, seated in her stuffy little parlor one evening, caught her in his arms and told her that he could not bear to let her go, that he was sure to lose her to a vast and admiring world, that he had tried to be unselfish in giving her to the world, but that his heart was sick within him with what he had done.

Amy in turn, with her cheek against his shoulder, sobbed out her nostalgia; begged him to release her from the vast project of taking this tour alone; clung to him; needed him. The next morning, Amy and Tom went off to a town twenty miles away and were married.

The newspaper, the town and the state gave a large grunt of disgust and turned to the second runner-up, a contestant in a large city who had fallen short of eight thousand votes of Amy's acclaim, to take the role of Miss U. S. A. Excitement fell away from the threshold of Amy Stricker-Powell overnight. She became any little bride in any little town, married to any little struggling fellow. They set up housekeeping in three rooms of a two-family cottage on a scrubby street at the end of the town. The community was irreparably disappointed in Amy and manifested itself by leaving her severely alone.

For the first few months of the marriage, the town's resentment lingered, and then the case of Miss U. S. A. was forgotten. The Tom Powells became comfortably a part of local life. Amy took up her household duties and Tom pursued his work. There were the usual struggles, the usual happiness, the usual ambitions, desires and hopes.

The first five years of their marriage Tom was promoted twice, Amy gained fifteen pounds, and three babies, all of them healthy and vigorous, were born. If the perfection of Amy's bloom faded, the little bland, blue quality of her eyes burned on. She was beautiful because she was happy.

And then catastrophe came. The eldest boy almost succumbed to meningitis. Amy fell off a ladder while painting her kitchen cupboard and had a bad time with a sprained ankle. Then Tom, out of a clear sky, took to his bed for a period of eighteen months with a hip disease that had gradually to correct itself. Tom's disability pinched the little household down to a state of actual deprivation.

Amy resumed her position at the library. During those long, dreary months she kept the little household going, maintained Tom in his wheel chair in dainty and immaculate fashion, took two of the children to school on the way to the library, did her marketing on the way home, prepared meals, accomplished much of her scrubbing and window washing after dark, waxed floors on her knees, did some of her card cataloguing for the library at home, exercised Tom on his bad leg and tided over the finances without having to resort to borrowing.

"There goes Miss U. S. A.," was the way the townspeople usually pointed her out to strangers. That came literally to be true.

Tom, when he kissed her and fondled her, as if he could never leave off expressing his gratitude, always thought of her in his heart as typical of Miss U. S. A.

When First President's Wife Gave Reception

According to an early chronicler, Mrs. Washington's levees were "open only to persons of privileged rank and degree, and they could not enter unless attired in full dress. The receptions . . . merely reproduced, on a smaller plan, the customs and ceremonies of foreign courts. . . .

"At these receptions Mrs. Washington sat. Guests were grouped in a circle round which the President passed, speaking politely to each one, but never shaking hands. At the first levee in New York, Mrs. Washington announced: 'General Washington retires at ten o'clock and I usually precede him. Good night.'"

Today we find in the unofficial guide known as authoritative on etiquette in our Capital: "It is correct for all political, official and resident Washington society to call once a year at the White House. This . . . consists of driving or walking up to the main entrance and placing the cards on a tray which a footman brings to the front door or to your car. These calls being merely tokens of respect, no one asks to see the President's wife; the whole ceremony occupying about half a minute from the gate of entrance to the exit on the other side.

"In recent years it has become customary for women, after they have left their cards as described, to ask for the honor of being received by the President's wife. This done by writing a note to her social secretary, which may be about as follows:

"'My dear Miss ——: Will you ask Mrs. X—— if I may have the honor of calling upon her, and let me know on what day it will be agreeable for her to receive me? Sincerely yours,' and so on."—Maude Parker in the Saturday Evening Post.

Pertinent Question

An Irishman strolling through London saw some pictures in a photographer's window. One was of a young man taken after he had attended a fancy dress ball in Mephistophelean costume.

After looking at it for some time he went into the shop and said he wanted a picture taken of his brother and himself on one card.

The photographer made the usual preparations and then asked for his brother.

"Oh, he's in Bristol," was the reply.

"And how," said the photographer, "can you expect me to take the picture of a man who is in Bristol?"

"Well," said the Irishman, "I'd like to know how you took Satan's picture. Did you meet him here?"

Where He Spent the Day

Mrs. Maggs had invited her neighbor to see the new decorations. The house had been repainted, and after examining the living rooms they went into the bedroom.

"My!" said Mrs. Diggs, admiringly. "Isn't it pretty? But what are the lovely pictures painted on the ceiling for?"

"For my 'usband," explained Mrs. Maggs. "'E likes to 'ave something to look at on Sundays."—London Tit-Bits.

Marjorie Won by Missing Party

By SIDNEY BLAIR

(©, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

"TOO bad you can't go, Marge. Did you put in both chicken and ham sandwiches? Sure? Sorry you can't go—we'll tell you all about it tomorrow."

Marjorie watched the other girls pile into the big sleigh. They were going to drive out to the Logans' summer camp, where the boys would be waiting for them, with big open fires blazing, and the radio going.

They'd all have supper there, and dance, and play games, and drive home in the moonlight, with the bells on the horses' harnesses jingling merrily.

She turned away, biting her upper lip hard to keep from crying. She'd wanted so dreadfully to go. But Mrs. Whitcomb, who owned the tea room, was very strict, and this was Marjorie's day to run the place during the dinner hour, always the busiest part of the day. This was Saturday, too, and Mrs. Whitcomb had a cold, just a slight one—and either she or Marjorie just had to be there on Saturdays.

She had put up their suppers—great baskets full of sandwiches and cakes and all sorts of goodies. If only she could have gone!

Carl would be there, Carl Waite. He'd been awfully nice to Marjorie. His father was the richest man in town, and Carl had a good position of his own, was "a good catch," as Mrs. Whitcomb said—Mrs. Whitcomb would have been glad if he had gone with her daughter instead of with Marjorie.

Marjorie went about her work courageously, seeing that the candles were lighted on the little tables, that the rose-colored shades were straight, that the cook had everything ready, that the menus were typed. One of the waiters sent word at the last minute that he couldn't come; he was ill with influenza.

"That means that I'll have to take his place," Marjorie reflected. "Oh, well, just one more thing." And she tied on a white apron over her simple dark frock. She hated to wait table!

The tea room was crowded for dinner that evening. There wasn't enough chicken—Mrs. Whitcomb was always advertising chicken dinners for Saturday night and then not buying enough chicken! Some of the people didn't want to have roast beef instead, and were awfully disagreeable about it, as if it had been Marjorie's fault that the chicken gave out. And one man moved suddenly and hit Marjorie's elbow just as she was setting a cupful of coffee down in front of him, and the coffee spilled all over his wife, who was furious, and blamed Marjorie. And the cook lost her temper and said she'd leave the next day, and Marjorie's head ached.

She was glad when at last everyone had gone. It was late, and few passersby went along the little side street on which the tea room was located. Nearly all the candles were out; only a few were still burning, but the firelight made up for them.

Marjorie took one last look around, and then sat down before the fire. She could have cried now, when there was nobody around, but somehow she didn't want to. She was too tired.

Some one came into the room. Marjorie sighed. People were always coming in after dinner was over, if you were particularly worn out, and asking if they could have something to eat. Oh, well, she could heat up some beef and vegetables, and there was an apple pie—

"Marjorie!" A man's voice, behind her. "Marjorie, aren't you going to speak to me?"

She turned quickly to face Carl Waite.

"Oh, Carl, how do you happen to be here?" she asked. Her voice was shaky with fatigue and excitement.

"Came back from the party early," he answered, sitting down beside her. "I wanted to see you."

"But—but it's too late for us to go now," she said. "To go back there, I mean. You see—"

"Of course it is," he answered. "I came quite awhile ago. I glanced in and saw you waiting on the table—"

"Oh!" she exclaimed. She hated to think that he had seen her like that; she must have reminded him of the second maid in his mother's home!

"And, Marjorie, you looked so—well, I stood there staring through the window. Marjorie, I love you. You know it, don't you, dear?'

"But I—why, I work—your father and mother—"

"They'd be mighty proud to have you in the family, a girl of your pluck," he answered. "Anyway, I love you so much that it wouldn't make any difference if they did object. I wanted to see you so much tonight, and when you didn't come with the other girls I was so disappointed, then suddenly I realized that I loved you. So I left the first minute I could slip away, and came back here so fast that I must have made a record. Marjorie, are you going to marry me?"

Marjorie's answer was buried in his coat collar.

Place of Interest

Junior accompanied his father to a neighboring state and was inspecting the old home of his father. After a look at the various rooms, the lad said:

"Now, I want to see the woodshed and those hickory sticks your daddy used to make you a good boy."

Daffodil Time Up in the Northwest

Daffodil time in western Washington turns thousands of acres of upland meadows into billowing seas of gold. The fields are those of the bulb growing industry, which in the Northwest rivals that of Holland. Above is a striking view of the Van Zonneweld farm, near Seattle. Overlooking it is majestic, snow-capped Mount Rainier.

Humane System Helps the Convicts

Prison Life Is Softened Under Scientific Methods, Hoover Is Told.

Washington.—The rigors of prison life of the past are being softened under humane and scientific methods, President Hoover has been informed in a letter from Sanford Bates, director of the bureau of prisons.

The murderous uprising in prisons during recent years may be avoided under this gentler system of dealing with people convicted of crime, he indicated.

The reform program which Bates outlined proposed:

New buildings, decent living conditions, improved diet, better qualified prison guards, probation and parole, and individual education of prisoners.

Because of aroused public sentiment and the co-operation of the administration, the program is already well under way, but there is much yet to be done, he reported to his chief.

"We are not yet out of the woods by a considerable margin," he said. "Our main penitentiaries are still grievously overcrowded. They are too overcrowded to permit of carrying out our program completely."

The argument that prisons might be made such nice places to live in that they would fail to serve as deterrents to crime was also considered by Bates. He took the position that punishment would not lose its sting "simply because it is constructive."

Fair Discipline.

"A prison need not have dirt, idleness, graft, and cruelty to deter persons from committing crime," he said.

"A strict program of prophylaxis, industry, education, and fair discipline with a modicum of constructive recreation will certainly not induce people to commit depredations on society."

The letter was in the nature of a report. It was requested by the President to ascertain what had been done to alleviate the situation which has aroused the country during the last few years.

Bates found there were only two problems involved: Overcrowding and the tremendous increase in prisoners as well as the reform methods of handling them. Six new federal prisons and four jails are being used, or constructed to meet the over crowding situation, he said.

The disciplinary barracks has been taken from the War department; about $3,100,000 is being spent for Northeast penitentiary in central Pennsylvania; 1,000 acres of land has been secured at El Reno, Okla.; 3,000 acres at Camp Lee reservation near Petersburg, Va.; $1,000,000 of additional construction is being done at Chillicothe, Ohio; $2,500,000 is being spent in the Ozarks near Springfield, Mo.

Jails are being started at New Orleans, Billings, Mont., El Paso, Texas, and in the Detroit area.

Prison Camps a Help.

Relief of jail congestion by the establishment of temporary prison camps was advocated. About 1,240 prisoners now are being cared for in eight which have been started.

Regarding this method, Bates stated: "To the extent operated they have solved the problem of overcrowding and idleness. No bloodhounds, guns or walls surround these camps. A strict honor basis is maintained.

"The number of escapes from these camps has been negligible, demonstrating that a large proportion of federal penitentiary prisoners can be trusted to work out their sentences in much less secure institutions than have been traditionally thought necessary."

Under the new parole sytem, instituted by a full time board, the number of prisoners on parole has been increased from 963 on July 1, 1929, to 2,638 on March 1, 1931.

A year ago 4,102 persons were on probation, today there are 9,253.

Hit-Run Autoist Hits Six at Once

Los Angeles.—A hit-and-run motorist who drove his automobile over six sleeping persons at a roadside camp is being sought. One man was killed and two women probably were fatally injured.

Georgia Leads States in War on Illiteracy

Washington.—Georgia, in teaching 118,102 persons over ten years of age how to read and write, has made greater progress in the campaign to reduce illiteracy than ony one of 20 states for which census returns now are available, the national advisory committee on illiteracy has reported.

In 1920 there were 328,853 persons above ten years of age unable to read and write, which represented 15.3 per cent of Georgia's population within that age group. The committee has reported that under the leadership of State Superintendent of Schools M. L. Druggan, the number of illiterates has shrunk to 210,736, until now but 9.4 per cent of the population above ten years cannot read and write.

The committee also reported much progress among the Blackfeet Indians in Montana. Within two weeks of instruction, 236 adult Indians between twenty-two and eighty-four years of age acquired some ability in reading and writing.

Mississippi ranked second to Georgia in progress. That state reduced illiteracy by 4.1 per cent of the population.

Open Window Started Girls on Burglary Career

East St. Louis, Ill.—Fourteen-year-old Emilie Gallmat and twelve-year-old Eunice Fritsche, have confessed to a series of robberies, their career, due they say, to a housewife leaving a bedroom window open. The two saw pretty dresses hanging inside, went through the window and took them. Since then, police say, they stole a canary in a cage, radio tubes, three paper dolls, lingerie and suit cases, before arrested.

NILE RIVER DESTROYING PICTURESQUE ISIS RUINS

Removal to the United States Suggested in Order to Preserve Ancient Structure.

Paris.—The Temple of Isis, on the island of Philae, is in danger of being destroyed by the ravages of the River Nile, and art lovers of many nations have demanded that something be done to save it.

Philae is near Aussuan, Egypt, and south of Syene. It is a small granite rock fringed with rich greenery, about 1,200 feet long and 450 feet wide, almost covered with ancient buildings of architectural beauty and historic interest.

The great Temple of Isis, to whom the island was sacred, was built chiefly by Ptolemy Epiphanes and continued by his successors, especially Ptolemy III.

The processions of pilgrims approached the island from the south, were received by the priests at a flight of steps at the southwest corner and then passed into a court with a colonnade to the right and left, erected by Tiberius and later Roman emperors.

To the north stands the great propylon, or gateway, 60 feet high and 120 feet wide. This is the oldest part of the temple and bears the name of Nectanebes II, who lived about 361 B. C. Beyond is another court, with several chambers and a small chapel. Another smaller pylon gives entrance to the temple proper, at the northern end of the irregular complex of buildings, converted into a Christian church in 577.

The great dam at Assuan, completed early in this century, did not injure the ruins, but the deepening of the dam by 26 feet, carried out in recent years, has submerged them. This, however, was said to have caused no serious injuries, but rather to have saved them at first from the inroads of weather, rains, the sun and winds, which had caused crumbling.

Now, however, rapid disintegration of hieroglyphs and small details of relief is reported, arousing concern. A wealthy antiquarian has proposed that the temple be dismounted stone by stone and transported to the United States, to be set up as of old in a safe place. Others would move it to another island in the Nile, to maintain the temple amid its ancient associations.

Unless some definite action is taken soon, it was said, there will be no way of saving the ruins from total disintegration. The historic old pile is said to be falling apart rapidly, and is doubted that it can be saved.

Balsa's Characteristics

Balsa wood is nearly white or sometimes tinted in red, showing practically no distinction between heartwood and sapwood. It has a silky texture, is rather coarse but straight-grained and is the lightest of all woods, ever lighter than true cork

WORLD WAR YARNS

by Lieut. Frank E. Hagan

Not A. W. O. L. but A. W. L.

"Bath House" John Cummings was a newspaper man in Scranton, Pa., before the war. In 1918, "the Bath" was a lieutenant of infantry with the Third division of Marne and Meuse fame. He was wounded in October, 1918. His outfit was in Germany when he recovered but hospital orders carried him to the central records office at Bourges where the service papers of the A. E. F. were kept.

"The Bath" stuck it out until a major who considered himself vastly important was placed in charge of the camp. For some minor offense, this man conceived an excessive distaste for Cummings and two others.

The major arose at all hours of the night to inspect the guard and check against the activities of Cummings and the other two officers. He haunted parade ground at retreat, seeking mistakes in the handling of the troops. Cummings and his two companions wrote direct to Chaumont and received travel orders to rejoin their regiments.

"Not a word about this," urged "the Bath," gloating over his orders. "Let's do this right." He hired a cab and the afternoon they were to leave halted it near the parade ground. The three were inside. First call for guard mount.

Minutes passed. The calls were sounded on schedule. But no officer of the day appeared. The fussy major grew panicky.

One of the men in the cab turned to "Bath House." "I happen to be the old officer of the day," he said. "I believe the major is looking for me."

"Yes," replied "Bath House" happily as he signaled his driver to move into action. "And I happen to be the new officer of the day. I know the major is looking for me!"

When a French rattler pulled out of Bourges for Paris ten minutes later the three looeys were riding snugly aboard.

How the Correspondents Got to the Front

When the First division of the A. E. F. was ready to go into the front lines, there were a half-dozen or so war correspondents who expected to go with it. This was in a French sector, and the French corps commander soon let it be known that they were expecting too much. They were to stay right there and he would see to it that a report on the work of the Americans would be sent back to them. "And there is nothing that says nothing so completely as a French official communique," remarked one correspondent in an acid aside to another.

So the correspondnts—Robert Small, Lincoln Eyre, Ray Carroll, Edwin James, Floyd Gibbons, Cal. C. Lyon, Heywood Broun and George Pattulo—appealed to General Pershing. "The accredited correspondents have a right to be with a division when it goes in," said the American commander in chief. The French corps commander sputtered. Such a thing wasn't done in France. Journalists didn't belong at the front. The French liason officer at Chaumont also sputtered.

"When the First division goes in, the American correspondents will accompany it," said General Pershing. And the way his jaw set meant that he meant that the American correspondents would accompany the First division. Followed much telephoning. French general headquarters was amazed at such a suggestion. American headquarters wasn't. It was firm. This was an American division, wasn't it? Yes, it was. Then the American command should decide as to its equipment, including war correspondents. Well, perhaps. Marshal Foch would have to be consulted.

Marshal Foch had better be consulted pretty quick. It was almost time for the First division to move forward, but there would be no move until this issue was settled. Less than half an hour before the time set for the move, Marshal Foch was talking on the telephone to General Pershing. "Of course, mon general, vous avez raison." So the correspondents went to the front.

Pershing's Message

The honor of receiving the first official message of sympathy from John J. Pershing, commander in chief of the American forces in the World war, went to the surviving relatives of Sergt. Theodore Peterson of the medical corps, A. E. F.

Sergeant Peterson was mortally wounded March 5, 1918, while serving with a regiment of field artillery which had gone into action. He continued to direct the care of wounded, despite his own hopeless condition, and died the same night.

The sergeant's brave conduct won him the posthumous award of a Distinguished Service cross. In addition, General Pershing dispatched this cable, the first of its kind, to Washington:

"Request you express my personal sympathy to nearest living relatives of Sergeant Peterson. After being mortally wounded, Sergeant Peterson gave detailed instructions to the wounded, and gave first gas test, in order to save the lives of the men about him. He was a gallant soldier and I have awarded him a D. S. C."

Wealth Awaits Salvage by Treasure Hunters

The value of the eight thousand vessels sunk during the World war is estimated at six thousand million pounds, a sum calculated to stir all the resources of adventure ancient or modern. The recovery of all this treasure is open to anybody who can provide the means and the enterprise. With the progress of underwater science, it is not stretching probability too far to anticipate that a very real industry will one day start in the form of treasure hunting under the sea.

Among the principal wrecks that await the diver are those of Wilhelm der Zweiter wrecked off the coast of Africa, with 3,700 bars of silver, the Florencian in the bay of Tobermory, with bullion valued at £3,000,000, the Lizard, sunk near Cornwall, with a cargo of gold valued at £14,000,000, the Thunderbolt, with £4,400,000, the Honcoop, with 2,200 tons of copper, off the coast of Africa, the San Pedro, in Margerita channel, off Central America, with a cargo of golden images and precious stones valued at £6,000,000, the Merida, off the Virginia coast, with precious metals valued at £600,000, and the Lusitania, off the South Cork coast, which is reputed to contain close on three million pounds worth of gold and valuables. There is also, among many others, the Arabic with treasure of about £1,000,000.—Montreal Family Herald.

General's Good Reason for Leading His Men

The retirement of General MacArthur brought the famous World war commander once more into the spotlight. Floyd Gibbons recounts this characteristic anecdote concerning him.

"With Frazier Hunt and the late Lincoln Eyre, I had gone to visit MacArthur, then a brigadier general, but he was out. We waited awhile and presently he came in, not in showy uniform but in a black sweater. He had personally led his troops over the top against a line of machine guns. The sweater was creased with bullets.

"Say, General," remonstrated Eyre, "we can't afford to risk a good brigadier general out there doing the work of a second lieutenant. You're much too important." To which MacArthur replied.

"'There are times in this war when the life of a brigadier general is not important. I want my men to know that I will never ask them to do anything I am not willing and glad to do myself.'"

World War Money

Many curious expedients were resorted to during the World war in order to prevent people of some warring nations from resorting to individual barter. The baser metals were used sometimes in place of gold and silver, often being gilded in order to carry out better the illusion of value. Printed wood was employed in Germany and Austria, also compressed pulp. Silk, linen and velvet were among some of the novelty fabrics used. Stamped leather was used, and postage stamps were encased in transparent cases and circulated as currency.

For small change, shoe nails were sometimes used as makeshift money, these being issued by local post offices here and there in some European countries.

Uses Wanted for Mercury

There is a good, big reward for anyone who will think up some new uses for mercury. During the World war the production of mercury was speeded up to the limit and at that there was not enough to answer the demands. Since that time mercury has been manufactured and has accumulated until there is a surfeit and some new uses must be found for it. It is stated that the surplus amounts to 3,000 flasks a year, and as each flask contains about 75 pounds, this means a total of about 100 tons. A very attractive prize, amounting to $20,000, has been offered by the French bureau de reparation for suggestions for new uses for mercury, but the ideas submitted must be new.

Speedy Pigeon Honored

As a mark of honor the pigeon which won the race of the 750 miles from Harwich, England, to Vienna, Austria, was given a special cage framed by fir tree branches at the recent pigeon exhibition at Dreher park, Vienna. The bird also made a world speed record. Six other pigeons took part in the race. The sport of carrier pigeons is again coming into vogue in Austria.

ELECTRIC SERVICE

WAITING FOR YOU

The evening after the picture show or the auto ride you return home and turn on the electric light. It has been waiting there for you—ready to respond instantly to any demand you make upon it.

Today, tomorrow and the next day you will call upon your electric company for instant service. You will give no warning as to when you will want it nor how much of it you will want. Yet, the service will be there, plenty of it, at all times, ready for use in large or small quantities, as you see fit, and to be paid for after you use it, not before.

This kind of service is possible only through the operation of large power plants inter-connected by substantial transmission lines.

And back of it all there is the desire on the part of your Electric Company to render you the best possible service at the lowest possible cost.

Two Picnics to be Held Sunday

June being the month of picnics, we have had many of this form of outdoor sport lately. This community will have a chance to attend two nearby picnics next Sunday, that promise to draw hundreds of people from all over the northwest.

At Thief River Falls, the Northwest Lutheran Assembly will be held Sunday at Squaw Point, where a fine speaking and musical program will be given. Refreshments will also be served.

The Marshall County Creameries Picnic will be held Sunday at the Old Mill Site, Foldahl. A good program has been arranged and all kinds of entertainment assured.

It is expected that Holt will be practically deserted Sunday, as the people will be attending these two celebrations.

Mr. and Mrs. Anton Hegle and daughters and son, from Lisbon N. D. are visiting at the S. Borsheim and Alfred Anderson homes. Mrs. Hegle is a sister of Mrs. Anderson.

Ed. Lee

Plumbing and Heating

What the arteries are to the body a plumbing system is to the home. Both require careful and expert attention when they need repair. If your Circulatory system is bad, you are doomed; if the plumbing system of a house is defective, you have no comfort.

Ed Lee at 213 North Main in Thief River Falls, knows how to put and keep the plumbing system of your house in order.

If your problem is one of heating whether it be hot air or steam system he has made your problem of heat his business.

If you are building a house consult Ed. Lee and he will advise you as to the best that can be obtained in the way of plumbing or heating.

There is not a house in this or surrounding communities where he has worked that will not vouch for the reasonableness of the charges and the high quality of the work done by Ed. Lee. Phone 397.

Silver Anniversary Marshall County Fair to Begin Next Thursday, July 2

Many Attractions Make This Three Day Celebration the Best in History; the 4th Will Be Fittingly Observed With Floats and Fireworks

Offering to Marshall county and Northwestern Minnesota its greatest variety of entertainment together with outstanding exhibits in all agricultural departments, the stage is all set for the Silver Anniversary Marshall County Fair and Fourth of July celebration at Warren on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, July 2, 3, and 4.

"We want the people of Holt and surrounding territory to come to the Silver Anniversary Fair at Warren next week and enjoy themselves viewing the attractive and educational exhibits and the many first class acts and races to take place before the Grand Stands," said Wm. Forsberg, president of the fair association.

"We feel confindent that we have assembled a greater array of talent than ever before in our effort to please the people of the territory and give them their greatest value."

July 2 will be entry day at the fair with no afternoon program scheduled, while in the evening a complete program will be presented, including races grandstand acts, music, dancing.

Friday, July 3, will be one of the biggest entertainment days of the fair, featuring a big finish wrestling math before the grand stand with Buck Olson, Northwestern Minnesota's most prominent wrestler who has gained national recognition in this sport. Buck's opponent has not yet been seleced but the fair management is lining up for a worth while competitor. This match will take place before the grand stand Friday afternoon. Another big feature on Friday will be the appearance of the Stephen High School Band, in two concerts, both afternoon and evening. This band won district honors in high school band work this spring and were given much favorable comment while participating in the state high school band tournament at the University of Minnesota in May.

Fourth of July will be celebration day in Warren, starting early in the morning and continuing throughout the day and night. At 10 a. m. a big Fourth of July parade will be formed in which large attractive floats, bands and decorated automobiles will compete for prize money totaling more than $150.

At the close of the parade a patriotic Fourth of July program will be presented in one of the city parks with Mayor Gerhard Bundlie of St. Paul delivering the principal address. Mayor Bundlie is an ex-service man and is one of Minnesota's outstanding Legion men. He is at present one of the most popular mayors the capitol city has ever had.

More than 30 horses have been entered in the horse racing program for Friday and Saturday two races being run each day. There are already horses on the track training for the big races.

Some of the grandstand act numbers will include Ed. Holter and his laugh provoking mule Ebenezer; Captain Jack Payne in a sensational 100 foot high dive into a flaming tank of water. Frank Zerado and Vera Patt troupe of Swinging acrobatic stunters: Joseph Blank and Co., European Novelty equilibrists and jugglers coming direct to the Red River Valley fair circuit from Berlin, Germany.

Space will not permit giving all the details, but if you want to be assured of a good time, spend a day or two at the Marshall County Fair in Warren. There will be something every minute you are there and you will see the best exhibits offered at any county fair in Minnesota.

Glenn Carlson Breaks Arm

Glen Carlson, the youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Carlson had the misfortune to break his arm on Friday when he fell as he was on his way home from the store. He was taken to the hospital at Thief River where he has had it set several times. An operation of the arm was necessary to make it stay in place.

A short time ago Reuben, the oldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Carlson, broke his leg and is now able to be around on crutches.

Our sympathy goes to the boys who are having such hard luck during their summer vacation.

The Salveson Studio

Photographs That Please

The Salveson Studio in Thief River Falls at 215 East Third is a place where the people know they will find expert professional work in all that pertains to modern photography for the proprietor is a man of wide experience in the work. He has won wide renown as an artist of first rank and maker of photographs that please. The Salveson Studio is moving into their new location about a half a block up the street.

Truly it has been said, "Your friends can buy anything you can give them, except your photograph." And photographs are not expensive because the proprietor of this studio is prepared to serve you in the most efficient manner at small cost.

Of course they are prepared also for the rarer and more costly work in this line and are examples of their artistic ability today in the homes of many of the families in this community.

The Salveson Studio has won the admiration of many parents through the excellent work done in making pictures and portraits of children. Whether it be an infant in arms or a child in school, they seem to possess that happy faculty of catching them in the most natural way.

In the making of photos of wedding parties and bridal groups or that individual photograph which will gladden the heart of a loved one or renew friendship's memories, The Salveson Studio has won a reputation in Thief River Falls and surrounding territory.

S. Salveson is a worthy member of the profession and the citizens of this section are to be congratulated upon having a photographer of such artistic ability in their midst.

World's Oldest City Is Rocked

Nackhichevan, Founded by Noah, Scene of Violent Earthquakes.

Washington.—Nakhichevan, Trans-Caucasian city recently shaken by earthquakes does not sound familiar, but may be it should! Nearby is Mount Ararat, where Noah is reputed to have grounded the Ark. Tradition has it that the prophet founded Nakhichevan—the name meaning "he descended here"—as soon as the waters receded. Citizens of Nakhichevan therefore claim that theirs is "the oldest city in the world."

"In the present-day world Nakhichevan is the somewhat drab, dusty little sun-baked capital of a tiny self-governing Soviet republic, of the same name, strung along the Persian border near the common 'corner' of Soviet Russia, Persia and Turkey," says a bulletin from the National Geographic society.

A Part of Azerbaijan.

"The republic of Nakhichevan is geographically the southernmost of Soviet republics west of the Caspian sea. Governmentally it is at the bottom of a kind of 'house that Ivan built.' Almost surrounded by the Soviet republic of Armenia, it is, nevertheless, a part of the Azerbaijan S. S. R., which in turn is a unit of the Trans-Caucasian Socialist Federation of Republics, which as a united entity forms part of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Nakhichevan nevertheless bears the proud title of 'autonomous.'

"Although the main occupations of the 105,900 Tatars and Armenian peasants of the republic are farming and cattle breeding, Nakhichevan is best known throughout the Soviet world as a producer of natural salt. Twelve miles from the capital are the rich Lenin salt mines, producing a grade of rock salt noted for its purity. The salt is brought to the city of Nakhichevan by motor truck, and shipped by railroad north into other Russian states, and south into Persia.

"Nakhichevan is one of the newer political divisions of the Soviet Union. Along with the rest of Trans-Caucasia it seceded from Russia and became part of three entirely independent republics in 1917. Constant strife and armed conflict followed until April, 1920, when conquering Soviet forces proclaimed Azerbaijan a part of the Soviet Union. The other parts of Trans-Caucasia soon followed. Nakhichevan was almost destroyed during fighting between the Armenians and the Tatars in 1918 and 1920.

Twin Peaks of Mount Ararat.

"Today Nakhichevan is a city of about 12,000, built along the rocky slopes of the River Aras. Stone houses with wide roofs climb from the river to the foot of brush-covered hills in the background. Along the sky line rise the noble twin peaks of Mount Ararat, the taller 17,000 feet high.

"Noah's grave near Nakhichevan's city limits, is shown to visitors, and it stands in high veneration both with the Armenians and Tatars, neither of whom seem to be aware that a similarly honored burial place also exists in the Holy Land, where it is regarded as a holy spot by Moslems.

"The ground which trembled to earthquake shocks in Nakhichevan has known the beat of hosts of marching men through the ages. The mighty armies of Cyrus, Darius, Xerxes, Alexander the Great, and Hannibal followed the banks of the River Aras on their campaigns of conquest and subjection. This highroad into Persia has been the scene of untold slaughter and misery, and more than forty great battles have been fought in the vicinity of Nakhichevan by forces seeking to control it."

16th Century Furniture Styles Are Coming Back

Chicago.—The newest furniture for American homes this fall will be four centuries old!

At least, that's the impression of furniture men from all parts of the country who attended the National Furniture market and style show at the American Furniture mart here. They mean, not that all the old beds and chests will be resurrected, but that Sixteenth century furniture styles are coming into popularity.

English designs, based on the Jacobean, Gothic and Elizabethan furniture of the Sixteenth and early Seventeenth centuries, was very much more noticeable in the manufacturers' displays this summer than formerly, it was said. Although Early American is probably still the volume leader of all period furniture, the Old English styles are gaining ground.

The English furniture was chiefly made of oak and this wood is used for the reproductions. The original pieces were also massive in size, and although the Twentieth century replicas retain the sturdy appearance of their predecessors, they are much smaller, scaled down to meet the requirements of modern homes, which do not contain baronial banquet halls nor castle courtrooms.

Boys Hunting for Gold Find Indian Cemetery

Alma, Neb.—Lure of possible hidden gold nuggets valued at $60,000, coupled with the curiosity of three sixteen-year-old boys, led to the discovery of an Indian burial ground here, with the result that excavations are being conducted this spring on the hillside filled with human bones and relics.

The youths were inspired by the tale that three white men had buried $60,000 in gold on their return from the California gold fields. Indians attacked the trio of prospectors, killing two, while the third fled, leaving the treasure behind. The legend has been told for decades, with occasional expeditions into a valley near here.

When the youths, armed with spades and a screw driver, attacked the soft earth on the highest knoll at the valley, they discovered human bones, a skull or two and several sea shells, beads and pottery.

The boys found that the bones and "Indian jewelry" were so brittle that they crumbled to dust when touched.

They reported their find to A. T. Hill, curator of archeology at a Hastings (Neb.) museum.

AIRPLANE CLOUD CHASING REVEALS RATE OF GROWTH

Meteorology Society Learns Ways to Fathom Weather Secrets From Air.

Washington.—Chasing clouds in an airplane to learn how fast they grow and to obtain other intimate secrets barred to earthbound weather men is the new kind of meteorology that was described before the meeting of the American Meteorological society here by Dr. J. B. Anderson, of the naval air-station at Anacostia, D. C.

Doctor Anderson wanted to learn something about the birth and growth of clouds in the more or less permanent layer that hangs over the Pacific coast of the United States. He was especially curious to find out the rate at which they piled themselves up into the air. He found that to keep his plane even with the top of one cloud he was studying he had to climb two or three hundred feet a minute.

How to get other weather data from the upper air without the expense of going up after it in an airplane was described by Dr. J. Patterson, of the Canadian meteorological service, Toronto. He has devised an apparatus that will flash back signals of temperature and pressure from an ascending small balloon as long as the observers can keep it in sight through a telescope.

Hitherto similar apparatus has been carried up arranged to record its experiences with a pen on a slowly moving strip of paper. But to get the story the weather man would have to wait until the balloon came down again and then depend on the chance of the apparatus being found and sent back by some farmer or woodsman. The new device is equipped with red and white electric lights fed by a flashlight battery. The mechanism is arranged in such a way that the order of flashing on and off of the lights will tell the observer on the ground whether the balloon is passing from warm air to cold, or vice versa. Similarly, another light signals by its flashings how much the barometric pressure is changing as the balloon rises.

Doctor Patterson pointed out that this device should be especially useful to meteorologists in polar regions or other unpopulated parts of the world, where the ordinary registering instruments are useless through the impossibility of getting them back again.

Pot Shot at Cat Blows Up House in Arizona

A CANDLE IN THE WILDERNESS

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

by IRVING BACHELLER

W.N.U. SERVICE
Copyright by Irving Bacheller

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon, to escape secular and religious tyranny, leave England in 1634 for the New World. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear. Heydon is apprehended and brought into court. He is found guilty. Heathers and Todkill are seen aboard a ship. Suspicion turns to Heathers.

Todkill smiled, exclaiming: "Od's blood! Ye look as wise as a midwife at a bornin'. I give ye my word he is not on this ship or on the shore."

Whereupon, Mr. Samp, always philosophical in his cups, turned his thought toward the eternal verities: "As a liar ye couldn't earn a farthin' a day. Ye don't do it natural like. It's left-handed lyin'. Everybody likes to believe ye if ye'll only give him a chance. Now there was Bill Shakespeare. I used to pass him every day on the street. He wrote out a lot o' lies—spun 'em so slick folks could believe 'em and they did. What happened? Why, Bill made a fortune by it. Amos, ye lie like a tapster. Ye don't give no one a chance. Ye'll die a poor man. If I was you I'd try the truth to help me. Now, there's a start on the right road."

Mr. Samp looked gravely into the face of Todkill.

"Well, John," said Amos, "this is hay to a jackass that is full o' oats. Ye got no more knowledge o' this world than a lame cobbler. I can't help ye. If I could I wouldn't take yer money."

They turned to witness a singular and a right perilous game now going on between two fishermen. It was the game of Jim Where—a deadly sort of duel. The players stood blindfolded, their wrists tied together. Each held in his right hand a stocking with a round pine ball in the end of it. One would call "Jim Where?" The other answered, "Here," and dodged, whereupon his adversary struck viciously, guessing at the location of the man he desired to hit. They took turns in calling and striking. A noisy crowd surrounded them, its members shouting words of encouragement. The air was filled with profanity and the odor of perspiration. In a moment one of the players was hit and fell like an ox under the hammer, dragging the other down upon him.

"Necked, by G—d!" was the shout that greeted the fall.

The man who had gone down lay for a moment stunned. He had been hit in the neck, which had turned black and blue and was swelling. The injured man and the crowd streamed out to the deck, where a fight had started. Mr. Samp had yielded to his specific gravity and sat down. He had nodded as the duel went on. Soon he was fast asleep.

Todkill said to the tapster: "He's got a brick in his hat. Let him sleep a while. He's had a hard day."

He hurried through the throng that surrounded the fighters to the starboard side and blew his whistle. Big Tom Wannerton and Dixie Bull were having a desperate battle with their fists. Often these engagements led to knives or belaying-pins and murder. It was Todkill's business to dip in with his mighty arms and pour his brawn and the oil of an able tongue on the troubled waters. Tonight he had other business. In a moment he and Robert Heathers were moving toward the shore. Their packs were ready, for Amos had anticipated the sudden arrival of an officer. Amos had his gun and pistol and a store of ammunition, a few light tools, bread, dried fish and moose meat. Robert had only his pistol, sword and clothing. Under their packs they set out on a path made by mast cutters, which led westward in the forest a distance of about three miles. Soon they heard many wild cries behind them.

"It's them crazy devils leavin' the ship and comin' ashore," said Amos. "They're yellin' and whoopin' like the fiends in hell. If ye'll drop down with me a minute we'll make some calculations. My ol' brain is on its tiptoes. There's a lot o' drift comin' down from up-river."

"What do you mean?" Robert asked.

"Woman trouble! I don't waste no breath giving' ye information. There's a great touse over it an' I reckon they need a neck for their noose. Don't worry. It's a little matter."

They sat on a bank by the path. Robert said:

"Since I went aboard that ship I do not wonder at the severity of the law. It's a battle with Satan."

"By the toe-nails o' Pharoah!" said Amos. "Ye need stout bolts on the hellward doors or everything would break loose."

It was the fashion of the time to swear by the beard of Pharaoh, but Amos did not so restrict himself in his swearing. He used any feature of the ancient monarch that came to his mind and made a free use now and then of his internal organs to express varying degrees of intensity. In moments of excitement his head quivered nervously and when he was pleased he would lift his right foot and give it a little shake. If vexed or in danger, he squinted his left eye while his right opened the wider.

Amos went on. "I'd have ye know there's a hot hell in front of us, but I hanker to see it. If we can make a map o' the country between here and the Lake o' the Iroquois we can sell it for a cart o' gold. No white man's foot has ever touched it. But I want ye to understand, full an' proper, it's dangerous. There'll be times when ye'll have Death at yer arm's end. Ye'll have to hold him there or he'll fly away with ye."

It Was Very Dark but Amos Seemed to Have Cat's Eyes.

"What's the danger?" Robert asked.

"Tarratines! The tigers o' the wilderness! The man that goes amongst 'em should take his shroud with him. They're at war with the Sokokis and have crossed the river in the north. If ye have arguments with 'em and get the worst of it they'll gnaw the meat off yer bones and eat it while ye're lookin' on and then boil ye in a pot. They ain't real nice folks but I reckon we can dodge 'em. If we can get to the big lake we'll make a dugout and put for Canada and take a ship to France. I know the great chief o' the Algonquins. His name is Tessohat—a one-eyed devil. Met him years ago at a big powpow. If ye don't want to gamble with yer life, now is the time to say so. We could wait till this storm ends and take water and with good luck get to Port Royal. There's fish in the sea and meat in the greenwood and the sea can be nigh as savage of the Tarratines. Take yer choice."

Robert was not dismayed by Todkill's description of the perils ahead. He had a longing for adventure and no great love of life, which so far had been a disappointment. He felt the lure of the vast, green, lonely, mysterious solitudes in the west as did Amos.

"I have had enough of the sea," he said. "The thought of it makes me ill. Let us take our chances in the great greenwood."

"Boy, I like yer courage," Amos answered. "As the toad said when the harrow was goin' over him, 'We're in an unfortunate position.' But I reckon we'll get through. We must travel close. Let me be captain. Never use a weapon or speak loud without my orders if ye put a penny's value on yer life. We'll push on beyond the end o' this path and lie up for the night."

It was very dark but Amos seemed to have cat's eyes in the night. Robert followed close behind him. When they stopped again Amos cut some boughs for a bed and they lay down, back to back, under a blanket.

"We'll pig together right here till daylight," said the pioneer.

Now Todkill was, in shrewdness, a man of a thousand. He had a fatherly interest in the handsome boy who lay beside him—the son of a gentleman with untold wealth in his background. In his devotion there was a touch of the love of the dog for his master. He did not know whether the boy had been lying with a woman or not. If he had, Amos thought none the less of him. After all, in his view, it was a trifling matter. He knew only that, when coming to the house for instructions late in the evening, Robert had told him that, forthwith, he must be taken away. Naturally he knew that some kind of deviltry was in the wind. As to its kind Robert had said nothing. Amos would not have ventured to ask even if he had not been pleased with his own lack of knowledge. Samp had given him his first inkling of the truth. Of course Samp had lied for the purpose of trapping Robert with the notion that there was no danger for him in returning to Boston. Else why was he so eager to get Robert? If William was convicted of what use was Robert's testimony? The story of William's conviction was made out of whole cloth. He would attend to his own affairs and do no babbling.

These reflections of Amos Todkill are set down in his diary with a full report of Samp's sayings.

All men who could write had the diary habit. Todkill was a methodical man. In the service of his wise friend, Capt. John Smith, he had learned many crafts. He had been above all an expert tree-climber. He carried a pencil and blank books wherein his maps are drawn in sections and notes made regarding them. Also some account of the adventures of each day are set down. On sundry pages, tersely and vividly, he has indicated his mental reactions. Before they slept that night Robert asked:

"What did the constable say to you?"

"Only that he was after you. He was like a lathered horse near the water pail. Came aboard thirsty and the drink crossed him. The poor old hitchcock! He shot his granny. Got slewed. I left him asleep in the taproom."

"Did he speak of Mabel Hartley?" the young man asked.

Amos divined the meaning of this query and answered: "She is in prison. I reckon I know now why ye've had a solemn look in yer eye. They'll keep her locked up till they get their hands on you. If you have been shakin' her skirts, keep away, or they'll hang the two o' ye. They're as hard as rocks. If ye have any feelin' for the wench stay away from there. She's safe till they get ye. When the excitement has blowed over we can see how things look. The main thing now is to keep alive. There's some o' the great men who are ag'in' this law. They'll kill it in time."

Robert did much thinking that night and in the nights and days that followed. Every day he tells in his diary of a sense of weariness and the need of sleep.

At daylight they went on traveling by compass. They came soon to a freshet in a valley where they sat down to eat with water to help their food on its way. The weather favored them, being still warm and clear. At the top of a high ridge Amos climbed a tree with his book and pencil to get the lay of the land and to look for Indian signs. He noted the position of mountains, lakes, ponds and rivers. Coming down he said: "There's an Indian village about two miles north o' here. We got to step careful now and keep our eyes peeled. There are two big mountain peaks, one due north and one a long way to west'ard. I reckon its shadow touches the big lake. A great fresh-water river is about ten mile ahead."

Cobra Worshipers Hold Deadly Reptile Sacred

Every year the dreaded cobra is responsible for the death of many thousands of persons in India, but so sacred is the snake considered that it is difficult to get the Hindu to asist in killing one.

In many Hindu houses these deadly reptiles have regular homes, and are daily fed with milk, and solemnly worshiped morning and evening.

At a place known as Subramanyaim, cobras are to be found in practically every house, and on certain festival occasions special services are held in their honor in the temple, thousands gathering from long distances to participate.

Although at any moment some member of the households harboring the snakes might accidentally be bitten—which means certain death — no one dare destroy the cobra on acount of its sanctity.

Even where the living snake is not worshiped images of the cobra, carved in stone, are common, and in the early morning one can frequently see men and women offering gifts before these "snake shrines."

Valuable Information

Grandma had just arrived on a visit and to take part in celebrating young Bobbie's birthday on the morrow.

After supper Bobbie started to fidget round grandma's chair. To the surprise of everyone present he said: "Grandma, which is the right side of you? Mother said if I'm a good boy and keep on the right side of you you might buy me a bicycle."

St. Lukes Hospital

A Community Asset Caring for Our Sick and Injured

Statistics show that one person out of ten occupies a bed in a hospital at some time during a year. So it does not require very much consideration to see how much this local hospital contributes to its community. The St. Lukes Hospital in Thief River Falls at South LaBree is a modern institution in which there is a joint use of medical equipment and co-operative organization of medical skill for the diagnosis, treatment and prevention of disease.

Here so much better care can be given than in the home, because this hospital is equipped for all emergencies. It is quiet and restful and you are under the care of competent nurses. Better care and attention is now being given their patients than has ever been offered in the history of the hospital. Hundreds of patients are taught health habits and how to control their diet in order that they may resume their daily tasks and avoid recurrence of their disease.

The St. Lukes Hospital is kept scrupulously clean and sanitary at all times and there is an air of cheerfulness about it that is always an aid to speedy convalescence. The building itself is modern and so constructed as to secure perfect free circulation of air and the maximum amount of sunshine in either the wards or the private rooms. They are all well lighted and cheerful.

More people are realizing every year the intrinsic value of this local hospital, where more progress has been made in the care of the sick in the last ten years than in any period in the previous fifty years. At one time the average patients stay at hospitals throughout the United States was thirty-five days. Now the average is eleven days. For instance, their stay has been shortened twenty-four days. A large number of the patients taken care of in this hospital were wage earners This saving in time alone, not even taking into consideration, worry, suffering and many other things, represents a huge amount of money saved these patients. This time saved is due to giving adequate service to patients. For instance, a staff of ethical physicians, who meet at regular intervals to discuss the various cases and their treatment, a well equipped laboratory, an adequate X-ray equipment, a complete record of patients' symptoms, temperature, history of the trouble and daily condition and treatment.

The St. Luke's Hospital in Thief River Falls is an institution of which the people of this community may be justly proud. Those in charge here have had long and scientific training in hospital work and do not tolerate any incompetency on the part of any employe. We are glad to recommend The St. Lakes Hospital in Thief River Falls for all cases or sickness or accident. Phone 155.

Greater Lake of the Woods Association International

At a joint meeting of Warrcad and Baudette business men held in Warroad on Wednesday of last week, announcement was made that one of the prime objects of the Greater Lake of the Woods Association International will be activity for a paved road from Lake of the Woods to Fargo and Grand Forks via Holt and Crookston. It is pointed out by business interests of Lake of the Woods area that there is a rapidly growing traffic between the commercial centers of Fargo and Grand Forks and northern Minnesota towns adjacent to Lake of the Woods. Likewise, there is a powerful community of interest between North Dakota towns and Lake of Woods because of the recreational and resort facilities. Just as this territory is more readily accessable to jobbing interests of Fargo and Grand Forks so this territory is equally readily accessible to Eastern North Dakota for fishing, hunting, and vacationing.

Truman Pierson, Director General of the association, in an address pointed out that a paved road to Fargo and Grand Forks from Lake of the Woods via Holt is essential and is bound to come within a few years. He advised, however, that an organized effort be put forth continously to bring this about.

Lion's Clubs from Crookston, Thief River Falls, Minneapolis, Duluth, Grand Forks and Fargo are attending a two day session of the association at Warroad yesterday and today, held for the purpose of getting closer united on this proposition.

Mr. and Mrs. K. T. Knutson called at the Mrs. Chas Haglund home Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Hagen of Thief River visited at the John Hagberg home Wendesday evening.

ELECTRIC SERVICE

A Servant With Giant's Strength

DR. JULIUS KLEIN, Assistant Secretary of the United States Department of Commerce, Recently Said in a Radio Talk:

"Here is a servant with a giant's strength an almost incredible facility in action—a servant, moreover, who is never saucy or sullen, breaks no dishes and breaks no furniture, does not tell the family secrets, is never in the way, demands no Thursdays off and never develops 'housemaid's' knee."

There are few homes which cannot afford this servant and this gives the woman of modest income the same opportunities as her more wealthy sisters. See your Electrical Contractor or come to our show rooms for a demonstration of electrical appliances for the home.

Good Eyesight Makes Champions

HELEN WILLS

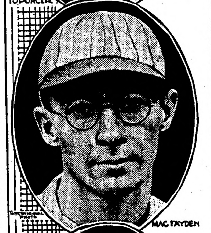
BOBBY JONES

TILDEN

WILLIE McFARLANE

BABE RUTH

TOPORCER



MACFAYDEN

LEE MEADOWS

By JOHN D. GRANT

BRAWN and agility alone will not make sports champions. Without good eyesight it is impossible to gain eminence in any of the sports that are most popular with the public today. The ability to see a fast ball quickly and accurately has made Babe Ruth the "home run king" and Helen Wills the "tennis queen," declares David Resnick, staff associate of the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness.

The American public loves to create heroes for itself in the different fields of sport, and Babe Ruth is one of the most popular of these national idols. It is possible that some of our readers, who never glance at the sporting columns, may not know about this Ruth person, so we will enlighten them briefly. Babe Ruth started out as a pitcher, and he was an exceptionally good one. It was not long before his ability as a batter became noticeable and it was decided that he was too valuable in that capacity to repose on the bench a large part of the time, so they made an outfielder of him. He immediately started in the business of manufacturing home runs. He turned them out with such persistent regularity that the sporting writers began to take notice and dig into their records. They had to throw them away because the Babe made new ones, and continued to do so until temporary incapacity curtailed his output.

What has enabled Babe Ruth to achieve his reputation on the diamond? Some people will say that it is his powerful swing of the bat, made possible by great strength in his arms. This is true, but equally important is the good eyesight which is essential when a fast ball is coming toward the man at the bat.

It is not only the sturdy arms of Helen Wills, but it is also her steady eye that make her queen of the tennis court. Bill Tilden, Jack Dempsey, Bobby Jones and the other topnotchers in the field of sport owe their reputations and success largely to the fact that they are blessed with healthy eyes as well as strong bodies.

Good eyesight is also important to the thousands of sport fans who go to watch their favorites perform. One cannot truly enjoy any athletic game, whether in playing or watching, unless one has clear vision.

Without such good eyesight that a strategic situation may be seen accurately and understood at a moment's glance, one cannot acquire skill in any sport. Most professional athletes realize this, and therefore, take every precaution to keep their eyes in good condition. Sometimes it is necessary for the athlete to wear glasses, but this does not mean that his days of usefulness on the field are past.

It is interesting to note that a few of the best known ball players in the major leagues find it necessary to wear glasses. Lee Meadows, an outstanding pitcher in the National league for several years, wore glasses in the pitcher's box. Another pitcher who wears them is Vic Sorrell of the Detroit Tigers, who is one of this year's sensations. Others are Toporcher and MacFayden. Glasses are worn on the baseball field also by Chick Hafey, outfielder of the St. Louis Cardinals, and by Mark Koenig, shortstop of the Detroit team in the American league, who is rather well known in New York city where he was shortstop for the Yankees for several years. Hafey and Koenig are the first fielders in baseball to wear glasses while playing.

Glasses are worn in other sports also. In tennis, for instance, Watson Washburn, who was for several years a member of the United States Davis cup team, has worn glasses on the tennis court for a long time. And in golf, Willie McFarlane, former national open champion and now a professional in Westchester county, New York, usually wears glasses while playing.

In colleges and high school throughout the United States, athletic directors are specially careful about the eyesight of members of the various school teams. Incidentally, boys and girls of high school age seem to be most susceptible to accidents that involve eye injuries. Perhaps this is so because they are very active at that age.

The National Society for the Prevention of Blindness, in a survey of eye accidents, found a strange variety of hazards in athletics, in the home, and especially in industry. There was a record of a painful injury when, in wrestling, one boy's finger found its way into one of his opponent's eyes. Also, there was the incident of one basketball player who apparently confused the eyes of another player with the basket at which he was supposed to be aiming. One university student was so confident of his own abilities that he took off his mask while fencing and had one eye put out by his opponent's foil.

In many sports there are chances of injuring the eyes with a ball—golf ball, tennis ball, baseball, handball, basketball, football and others. But in golf, aside from the danger of being struck by the ball, inquisitive persons occasionally suffer eye injuries in cutting open discarded golf balls. The knife may slip and strike the eye, or the rubber may cause the ball to rebound and hit the eye. In any event, this curiosity as to the contents of a golf ball has a certain element of danger.

Among the games of boyhood, important causes of eye accidents are the realistic cowboy, Indian and racketeer games which make necessary the actual use of air rifles, blank pistols, or bows and arrows. The old-fashioned sling-shot has not gone out of existence either. Apparently there are many parents who do not realize the obvious mistake in trusting children with such dangerous toys and weapons as these.

In case of an accident to the eyes, it is well to know exactly what to do. There are three cardinal principles of first aid after eye injuries. The first of these is cleanliness; next, prompt rest for the eye; and, third, medical care directed by a competent physician, preferably an oculist. These principles apply even if the injury is slight, and they are imperative with serious eye injuries.

Old Myth Telling of Animals' Theft of Fire

This myth goes back for its beginnings to a time when there were no people in the world. Animals and trees talked and walked about just as men do now. But there were galling monopolies even in those days. Pine trees had all the fire there was. The animals stood it as best they could, until one long, cold winter when they almost froze to death. Then they called a council and planned to steal fire from the pines.

Word came of a council of pine trees on the banks of the Grande Ronde river, where they had built a great fire to warm themselves. So a beaver swam over there and hid under the bank where the guards could not see him. After a long time a live coal left the fire and rolled down the bank, where it was caught by the beaver who hid it in his breast. Then there was a merry chase. The beaver ran very fast, dodging this way and that. Pine trees nearly caught him. Finally the larger and older trees grew tired and stopped on the river banks, where they are so thick that even now it is difficult to find a way through them. But a few pine trees, more agile than the rest, kept on, and finally when the beaver was hard pressed he swam across the river and gave fire to the willows and the birches. That is why fire can be got from these woods by rubbing sticks together.—Exchange.

Famous Botanic Garden

The Botanic garden in Washington was established by the Columbian Institute for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences, incorporated by an act of congress April 20, 1818. The present site was granted by congress in 1820 and there is a tradition that George Washington contemplated the establishment of gardens in this locality. Up to 1836 no improvements had been made. The tract was a stagnant and malarial swamp and congress was prevailed upon to make an appropriation of $5,000 for improvements. The real beginning, however, of the Botanic garden dates from the Wilkes exploration expedition of 1838 to 1842. The staff included a botanist, W. D. Breckenridge, who brought back from an expedition to the South seas a large collection of specimens, including seeds and cuttings. This formed the nucleus of the botanical collection.

Insists Lower Animals Know Little About Pain

According to an article by Dr. Harold Jackson of the zoological department of London university, a lobster is not hurt by throwing it into boiling water, any more than a telephone instrument is pained by being banged on the floor. He claims that pain is an entirely relative term and except for ourselves, our near relatives and possibly the most artificial domestic animals, it does not exist in the meaning we give the word. "Pain in most lower animals acts as a sort of burglar alarm, which has no feeling of itself but gives notice that something definite is wrong and can probably be set right by certain standardized actions. If animals really had the sensitive feelings that are sometimes attributed to them, what a horrible agony life in natural conditions would be for them. What nonsense it is to talk about the agony of a lobster being plunged alive into boiling water." While canned lobsters are largely used today, there is still a demand for the fresh lobsters, which are shipped alive and are conveniently killed by putting in boiling water, a process which changes the green shells to an attractive red.

ONE OF THE DIVA'S RETINUE

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

AROUND the heroic figure of Camilla von Stroheim had always whirled entourage.

She had been a prima donna since she had flashed, at a robust seventeen, a magnificent Brunhilde, upon a public that welcomed her permanently to its bosom. For the first fourteen years of her triumphant career, during the lifetime of Herr Graf von Stroheim, one of Germany's magnates, she had three times toured around the world in operatic and concert capacity, success always in her wake.

After the death of her husband, Camilla had spent most of her time in America, traveling in continuous tours with her daughter, three or four maids, secretaries, chauffeurs and a special valet whose exclusive duty was to care for the dozen or so Daschunds, which invariably made up part of the diva's caravan.

Paula von Stroheim, daughter of Camilla, had been born in the Waldorf-Astoria in New York city, christened in Berlin and educated by governess and tutors of practically every civilized country of the world. At seventeen she was a pasty-faced girl, given to occasional outbursts of tiny pimples, narrow-shouldered, slightly near-sighted, and as far removed as possible, from the exuberant, creature-beauty of her mother and in no way similar to the stout expansive figure that had been her father's.

Curious, but von Stroheim, probably too busy with the glitter of her own career, had never been acutely conscious of these physically shortcomings of her daughter. She adored her. She lavished endearments, gifts, indulgences, and was most elaborately demonstrative. She had a nickname for Paula; a ridiculous one. "Pet-cat."

"My darling-cums Pet-cat, what would mother do without you?" "My angel-faced Pet-cat, how could von Stroheim exist if it were not for you?"

Angel-face or no angle-face, well might von Stroheim ask herself that question.

From the time Paula had been six she had slavishly been serving her mother. By the time she was sixteen, no lady's maid, no masseur, no attendant of any kind whatsoever, could bring to von Stroheim the sedative kind of relaxation that emanated from the fingertips of her daughter. Paula served her mother heart, soul and body. She was on call in the watches of the night, when the great diva, given to insomnia, wanted to talk. She was on call in the wings of the opera house, when the great diva, impatient of her physicians, wanted Paula, who stood waiting with a throat syringe. She was on call with the train schedule; concert schedule; hotel schedule. In other words, the frail and pasty-faced little Paula was doomed to walk in the wake of grandeur.

Until she was about nineteen, however, these realizations did not bite in. Her adoration of her mother was so colossal that it dwarfed her sense of relative values. Von Stroheim was like a great sun in the center of Paula's life, throwing its fierce, powerful rays everywhere about her. The tempers, the temperaments, the moods, the vagaries of her mother, were the indicators, so to speak, in the life of Paula. When von Stroheim smiled, Paula smiled. When von Stroheim threw glassware and tore silk to shreds, Paula's little soul quailed within her. But it must be said for von Stroheim, that whatever her moods, whatever her fluctuations of temperament, her attitudes toward her child were chiefly those of adoration.

As the members of the entourage and the sychophants who hung on the outskirts of the retinue that surrounded the great prima donna used to say, Pet-cat was her sole reverence. Pet-cat was the only creature on earth she really loved. And fiercely Paula loved in return; worshipped the flower-strewn ground on which her mother trod, had no thought of self, because hers was bound up in the magnificence of von Stroheim.

It was when Paula was nineteen that there wedged into her life an emotion that was new, terrifying and ecstatic. A secret emotion, which she would not admit at first even to herself, and yet as it became more and more apparent it was wonderful to lie on the cot she invariably occupied at the foot of her mother's great bed, and let these strange ecstasies sweep over her in floods of enchanted sensations.

Paula was in love with the small blond accompanist who had joined her mother's retinue a few months previous. He was a German fellow, teutonic, blue-eyed, yellow-haired, who spoke English as fluently as he spoke his native tongue, a brilliant musician with promise of a fine career of his own, after a few years of apprenticeship as accompanist. Von Stroheim was not easy to serve in this capacity. Her experience with accompanists was varied and full of all kinds of regretable experiences. They came, they went. She was known as a "holy terror" to the pianists who had served her and young Meyer Gluck was not unaware of this when he enlisted as her pianist.

Of all his predecessors, however, Gluck had been the most successful. Von Stroheim liked him; had taken a fancy to him from the start. She petted him, she babied him and had personally nursed him through a heavy grippe cold which had overtaken him in Seattle on one of her cross-country tours. She even had a name for him, as ridiculous in its way as Paula's. "Pet-boy." The young man flushed whenever she applied it to him, even after months in her service. It made him feel ridiculous, and at heart he was a shy, serious, ambitious, fellow, full of dreams of ultimate pianistic triumphs.

Paula found herself also harboring these dreams for Gluck. In the hotels where their retinue camped on its tour from city to city, her greatest joy was to find a place near the door of Gluck's room, and stand there listening to his practicing, as it came in avalanche arpeggios down the long impersonal hotel corridors.

Paula was in love.

Overwhelmingly maternal as von Stroheim was in her treatment of this girl; ardent, emotional, demonstrative and indulgent, there was not between them, at least so far as Paula was concerned, any relationship that admitted of a revelation of the minute secrets of the mind and heart, chiefly it must be admitted, because Paula up to this time, had owned none in particular. At nineteen she was practically as much of a child to her mother as she had been at nine. Paula was no problem to von Stroheim for two reasons: the great diva was to occupied with the intricate problems of her famous self and so subtly had the eventful years slipped by, that von Stroheim had no conception of the fact that her daughter was an adult.

"Pet-cat my darling-cums, come sit on your mother's lap." "Pet-cat angel, come rub your mother's head." "Pet-cat my baby, wake up and talk to your mother. I can't sleep." And always the talk was of the diva; her triumphs, her defeats, her hopes, her chagrins, her tempers, her loves, her hates. And of all of them there were aplenty, because as time went on, and her position became more and more secure, von Stroheim became more and more the temperamental operatic star.

That was why, when love came to Paula, strangely, shyly, secretly, it was something she could not find the voice to impart to her mother. It was sufficient in the beginning just to stand off and secretly adore, and secretly, oh so secretly, hope and hope and hope.

And out of the hoping was to come this:

One evening, entering the hotel suite in Detroit, wrapped in sables, blazing with gems, laden with long stem roses the odor of which perpetually surrounded her, von Stroheim rushed up to her daughter, catching her tightly and ecstatically in her arms.

"My darling-cums Pet-cat, will you forgive your bad, naughty mother who loves you? She went and got herself married. You have a sweet new darling Pet-boy for a father."

Precisely that had happened. Von Stroheim and Gluck had been married by a local magistrate. A thunderclap had descended upon the life of a narrow, pasty-faced little person known as Paula von Stroheim. A thunderclap that was to reverberate through a life time.

Strange, that neither von Stroheim nor young Gluck were ever to have an inkling of this secret catastrophe in the heart and soul of Paula. She was the same unobtrusive, willing little soul she had always been. Von Stroheim, if possible, was more fiercely, relentlessly, maternal after her marriage, than she had ever been before. The terrible part to Paula was that Gluck was so gentle, so considerate of her well-being; so eager to successfully serve in his fantastic capacity as stepfather. After all, he was only eight years the senior of Paula.

What happened subsequently came so gradually that it is doubtful if Gluck was conscious of it until after the condition was too well established to be remedied. It is doubtful if he even desired a remedy, so all-embracing, so powerful, so possessive, and so sedative was the claim of von Stroheim upon his heart and mind. She showered him with the magnificence of her affections, just such as she had showered Paula. She smothered him with indulgence, with endearments, and with a quality that transcended his own, and just as it had transcended Paula's.

At the end of the second year of this strange marriage, there was serving the great von Stroheim, not only the daughter who walked quietly in the wake of her magnificence, but the young teutonic-looking husband, who had receded by this time, in what was to be the permanent role of accompanist and member of the diva's retinue.

From city to city, from country to country, wanders this magnificent caravan de luxe, the extravagantly personable prima donna shedding effulgence everywhere she goes, and in her wake, adoring her, the little daughter named Paula, and the little husband named Gluck.

Gas Destroys Metal

Many gases were developed during the war for one purpose or another, and one which was designed to attack the individual was found to operate in a much more effective and humane manner. It has a very rapid corroding action on metal so that a gun subjected to the fumes is rendered utterly useless in a few hours.

"Urban Population"

Heretofore it has been defined by the census bureau that the term "urban population" includes all cities and other incorporated places having 2,500 inhabitants or more. For use in connection with the 1930 census the definition has been extended to include townships and other similar political subdivisions (not incorporated as municipalities) which have a total population of 10,000 or more and a population density of 1,000 or more per square mile.

Johnson Millinery

Hats and Frocks

The woman who carefully considers her appearance, and all women should, will never fail to give much thought to the hat that in its own way crowns her entire costume.

No matter how dainty the dress or how elegant the coat, unless the hat is of harmless color, a becoming shape and a decided smartness, the entire effect is spoiled.

One may be able to conceal by a tuck or a fold some minor defects in the gown, but the hat must fit perfectly, both for looks and for comfort, and must be of the most perfect workmanship.

The Johnson's Millinery in Thief River Falls at 312 North LaBree, has established an enviable reputation for the services rendered, and the skill with which the assistants suggest just the right style and shape for each individual patron.

Indeed the ladies who have learned the advantages of purchasing their hats at this shop, can feel quite sure that they are wearing a hat both becoming and smart. When you are in Thief River Falls again, why not verify what we have said by stepping in at the Johnson's Millinery and having them suggest a hat for you.

They also feature wash frocks of voile, batiste and other summer materials from $1.00 to $1.95. Phone 175.

Magnuson and Co. Feed Store

The Magnuson & Company, in Thief River Falls 312 East 3rd Street, are giving the farmers of this territory a splendid feed service. They sell feeds of all kinds, and we believe you will find this a good place to patronize.

Almost every farmer is now convinced of the advantages of scientific feeding, and the firm that provides a dependable feed service is sure to become popular with the progressive farmers of the surrounding territory. The fact that these gentlemen have come to know what feeds have the highest nutritive value, brings business from a wide scope of territory. This of course adds much to the business and prosperity of the community.

Their place has become headquarters for many farmers when they go to Thief River Falls, for they know that they are always welcome, that they will receive good service, and that their products will give satisfaction.

The Magnuson & Company, Feed Store, has greatly contributed to agricultural development of this community. Phone 42.

The Thief River Greenhouse

Flowers for All Occasions

The Thief River Greenhouse with store at 105 East 3rd Street in Thief River Falls, supplies the people of this territory with the choicest flowers for all occasions.

They handle only the finest specimens of the best varieties which are always fresh. They give the most painstaking attention to every order and give their customers just exactly what they want.

They make a specialty of floral designs of all kinds, featuring special designs for weddings, parties, etc. Their greenhouses are large and modern and here will be seen growing the finest specimens of flowers and plants. They are well heated and ventilated so that the flowers grow as well as though they were in a natural setting, thus assuring you of the freshest flowers at all times.

Their delivery service is very complete and your orders will be filled promptly and efficiently.

In this review we are glad to compliment them and refer The Thief River Greenhouses to our readers for the best in floral service. Phone 102.

Death Takes No Holiday

More people are killed in motor vehicle accidents on Sundays and Holidays than on all other days.

Saturday and Sunday, July Fourth and Fifth, are holidays and motor traffic will be very heavy.

Will "ACCIDENTS" cause sorrow and suffering to follow or will every driver of a motor vehicle TAKE TIME TO PLAY SAFE and make these days ones of welfare and happiness for all?

Storm Breaks Heat Spell

A heavy wind and rain storm hit here on Tuesday evening. The wind, which almost developed into a twister, blew down big trees, small sheds and also done some damage to the larger farm buildings.

The local telephone company reported that several of its lines were down and the high line furnishing this village its power was broken.

Poison Gets Cucumber Beetles

If cucumber beetles are bothering your cucumbers at this time, their ravages can be stopped by the use of a dusting mixture composed of one pound of calcium arsenate and 15 pounds of gypsum, or land plaster, says A. G. Ruggles. state entomologist, University Farm, St. Paul. The plants must be thoroughly covered with this dust, especially around the base of the stems and the tender shoots, if it is to be used effectively.

Many Fishing Licenses Sold

More than 200,000 Fishing licenses have been sold in Minnesota so far this year, according to the state game and fish department. Up to June 1, 153,253 licenses had been sold, netting the state $130,800. More than 50,000 have been sold in June, it was estimated.

The state sold 10,630 non-resident licenses at $3 a license up to June 1, while 95,216 individual licenses at 50 cents each were issued. There were 4,177 family permits given at $1 each during that period.

During the year 1930, 445,931 fishing permits were issued by the department, bringing $395,734.58 into the department's coffers.

Attended Lutheran Picnic

Several hundred Lutherans from congregations in the Thief River Falls circuit gathered at Squaw Point near Thief River Falls on Sunday for what was termed the largest Lutheran assembly held in this part of the state.

Rev. T. F. Gullixson, head of Luther Theological Seminary of St. Paul, spoke. General arrangements were made to have the event become an annual affair and officers were elected to take charge. They were: Rev. Fjelstad. president; Dr. O. F. Mellby, vice-president; Rev. Dahle, secretary; H. Dahlen, treasurer.

It was also decided that the assembly be held on the 4th of July in 1932 as it falls on Sunday next year, and it was left up to the officers to name the place at which the celebration will be held.

Gasoline Taxes Increase But Motor Taxes Fall Off

Taxes on in-shipments of gasoline in May, 1931, after deducting refunds, amouted to $1,092,405, an increase of $213,135 over May last year. Gasoline taxes for the first five months of 1931 amount to $4,092,952, compared to $3,672,441 for the same months in 1930.

Both the trunk highway fund and the county road funds will gain by the increase, as one-third of the gas tax goes to the counties and two thirds to the trunk highway fund. The latter, however, is suffering a loss of revenue through a drop in motor vehicle registration. Up to June 1, 1931, $10,196,076 has been paid in taxes on 692,352 vehicles, while at the same date in 1930, the tax on 697,541 vehicles total $10,396,209.

N. S. A. News

The fall term of the Northwest School of Agriculture will open Monday, September 28th, with special instruction in Agricultural, Home Economics, Music, and Business courses. As the winter term closes the last week in March, this makes a very convenient time for farm boys and girls to be away from home, for they are thus free to assist with the farm work during the crop growing and harvesting seasons.

Students from all points in Northwestern Minnesota, in addition to a number from North Dakota, have already reserved rooms for the fall term. J. W. Mlinar, registrar, states that additional reservations from eighth grade graduates are now being received.

The entire cost of the regular course including board, room, books, flat laundry, fees and entertainment averages $145.00 for a student for the entire six mos. school year. Furthermore, a number of students are able to work for a part of their room and board, while others are assisted through student loan funds.

The regular course, which is open to boys and girls who have completed the eighth grade, or to young men and women who have reached the age of sixteen years or over, covers a period of three years of six months each. Students who return for the fourth or preparatory year are eligible to enter any of the Colleges or Universities in the state.

According to Superintendent A. A. Dowell, 1096 students have graduated from the Northwest School of Agriculture.

Expose Suicide Club in Probe

Twenty-Four Already Have Taken Their Lives; Seek to Save Others.

Amityville, N. Y.—Startled by revelations of a suicide club of which twenty-four members already are said to have taken their own lives, police are making strenuous efforts to prevent the self-destruction of the twenty-six persons whose names have been given to them as the surviving members.

Expose of the alleged club came from the reluctant lips of Miss Louise Schwartz after she had been taken into custody and threatened with a charge of murder growing out of the death of her fifty-five-year-old brother, Edward, a wealthy business man.

Miss Schwartz later was indicted on a charge of murder in the second degree, accused of shooting her brother to death on orders of the club after prayers for his relief from chronic rheumatism had failed to effect a cure. Miss Schwartz, pleading not guilty at her preliminary hearing, said that her brother had committed suicide and that she had not slain him because, as the authorities believe, his nerve failed when he was told that the time had come for him to die by his own hand.

Believe Story True.

Not only were authorities of Nassau and suffolk counties inclined to believe the fiction-like organization exists, but Dr. Theodore Reed, owner of a private hospital, said he believed, from revelations of mental patients from surrounding towns, that Miss Schwartz's story is true.

The same opinion was given by Dr. Richard H. Hoffman, an alienist who examined Miss Schwartz. Although he found her the victim of "delusions and obsessions," Doctor Hoffman said the woman apparently was speaking truth in mentioning the suicide club.

The club was formed several years ago, Miss Schwartz told authorities, after members had "delved into the history of suicide" and were "convinced that scientific Christianity did not prohibit self-destruction."

The club's specific aim, Miss Schwartz said, was to bring about cures through prayers. If the prayers were unavailing, then suicide of an ailing member was the only alternative, or if he failed to take his life then a member of the cult was chosen to put him to death.

Mostly the suicide club was composed of elderly members and among the names she mentioned was that of George Britenbach, who committed suicide by hanging last April 25.

Found Many Recruits.

Within a short time after its formation, there were thirty members of the club, Miss Schwartz said.

"We formed the club four or five years ago," she said. "All the members are along in years and ill mentally or physically. Every Sunday night we met at the home of a member to pray for a period of four hours that one of us would be cured of our feebleness. There were many members, and twenty-six are still living.

"If the member for whom we prayed was not helped by our prayers, he was bound by oath to commit suicide. If he failed to end his life before the next meeting, he was to be slain by a chosen member of the cult.

"When we met at the home of George Britenbach, we found he was not receptive to prayers. So he committed suicide."

When prayers failed to cure her brother, Miss Schwartz said, he committed suicide after she reminded him of his duty to the cult.

Circumstances, however, pointed to murder, police say. They claim that Miss Schwartz was the member designated to end the life of her brother after he balked at taking it himself.

He Was a Cripple.

Schwartz had been a sufferer from chronic rheumatism for ten years. As a result, he had become crippled in arms and legs. Police, called to investigate his death, found he had been shot three times by a revolver which was found beside him. Any of the three wounds, medical experts said, would have prevented the other two from being self-inflicted. One wound in the top of the head could not have been fired by Schwartz's own hand.

Miss Schwartz admittedly was the only other person in the home prior to the finding of the body. Her story is that she had gone out, leaving her brother alone, and returned to discover his body.

Experiments Show How Far We Walk Every Day

Boston.—The average American takes 18,098 steps per day, the equivalent of 7⅞ miles.

At least this is the estimate of Dr. Joseph Lelyveld of Boston, director of research for the National Association of Chiropodists-Podiatrists, based on a series of experiments.

The average housewife, in doing her daily household tasks walks as far as from coast to coast each year.

Other mileages recorded in studies of pedestrians of all walks of life included:

Woman shopper, 8⅓ miles per day; schoolboy, 15 miles; school girl, 11⅓ miles; doctor, 18 miles; farmer with plow, 25⅓ miles; salesgirl, 8 miles; steward in grill room, 12⅓ miles; conductor, 7 miles; policeman, 14 miles; letter carrier, 22 miles; store manager, 6¼ miles.

Farmer Plows Up Watch Lost on Ranch in 1888

Oakdale, Calif.—In 1888, 43 years ago, Berchard H. von Glahn lost his watch while plowing on the A. C. Paulsell ranch near here. This spring Hartwell Summers, while plowing the same field, found the timepiece. He didn't know von Glahn, but met his son, a scout executive, during a scout meeting here, and asked if he know B. H. von Glahn and the return of the watch was made.

NEW YORK TURNING RURAL ABOVE THE TWELFTH FLOOR

Flowers, Shrubs and Trees Now Sprout From Terraces of Its Skyscrapers.

New York.—New York, the world's most populous city, is rapidly becoming the most countrified—above the twelfth floor. Flowers, shrubs and trees are now sprouting from hundreds of lofty terraces which the skyscraper "set back" laws have created.

Some of these sky gardens contain, on a small scale, practically all the charms of the countryside, Home & Field reveals. All over Manhattan "high life," which begins at about the twelfth floor, is becoming country life.

The ordinary visitor to New York does not see the sky gardens, for they are not visible from the streets hundreds of feet below. But airplane pilots flying low over the city see hundreds of them. Nearly every terrace on the new skyscraper residences now supports one or more gardens.

Some of them are very elaborate, the magazine says, vine-covered trellises, hedges or woven-wood fences screen their occupants from the stares of the curious in other buildings. Flowers and plants of many kinds—even trees of considerable size, grow from boxes and pots. Sundials, statues, fountains and garden furniture also add atmosphere. In fact, very few of the attractions of real country gardens are lacking in these shady retreats in the sky.

The "set back" laws were intended primarily to insure light for city streets. It is generally conceded that they have done so. And they have also made New York—above the twelfth floor—the most countrified metropolis in the world.

Loud Speaker Plays Prank on Woman Orator

Washington.—A loud speaker recently played a cruel prank on Miss Maude K. Wetmore of Newport, R. I., when she was about to address a session of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform here.

She had no end of trouble adjusting her voice to the amplifier. It was either too low or too loud.

Miss Wetmore was provoked. In an aside she exclaimed, "O! What's the matter with the darned thing?"

The loud speaker was never better. It sent her words booming out to her audience to be greeted by much laughter and applause.

A Candle in the Wilderness

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon leave England in 1634 for the New world. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear. Heydon is apprehended and, refusing to talk, is found guilty. Heathers and Todkill head for New Amsterdam and suspicion begins to point to the former.

They traveled south a little to avoid a lake which Amos had outlined on his map. He bit off a mouthful of tobacco from a pressed slab of it, flavored with sugar and licorice, which he carried in his wallet, and led the way, his keen eyes sweeping the wood. In a moment he stopped and raised his hand a little. He stood listening. Then he beckoned to Robert who came to his side. He whispered:

"See that streak o' light ahead?"

The young man nodded.

"I reckon it's a path. Lie on yer belly here and keep yer eye on me. I'll sneak up and take a look."

Cautiously Amos approached the streak of light. It was above a well-worn path. At its edge, kneeling, he put his ear to the ground. He leaned over the red man's thoroughfare as he clung to a bush, looking both ways.

"Don't step in it. Put the gad on yer nags and jump," Amos whispered when Robert advanced.

With long jumps they cleared the path and went on. They skirted a great swamp and a pond on the edge of which they could see through the brush a number of deer and a moose feeding. Suddenly they came to a deer path leading down to the water. Amos stopped and pointed to a tree leaning over the path.

"See that old whelp?" he whispered.

Looking upward Robert saw a great cat with black tufted ears, crouched on a lower limb. Seeing that he was observed, the cat, without stirring emitted a low, ominous growl.

Amos smiled and whispered again: "He says: 'Ye varmints, tend to yer own business an' let me alone.' He's a lynx and he can tear the roof off a deer in about a minute. A brother o' the Tarratines! We'll go out around him. I don't want to see him jump."

They came to a clump of moosewood, and Amos cut an armful of the lithe bushes and stripped their bark, storing it in his pack. They reached the big fresh-water river at nightfall after hours of the most cautious travel. Amos made no stir here until he had listened with head above and below the water. The river was more than two bow-shots in width with little current. He rigged a small raft out of fallen trees, covering it with the bark of a dead spruce and lashing it with the lithe, strong, rope-like bark of the moosewood to his under timbers. After that he made long leashes of the bark.

"Now we'll undress and put our goods on this little raft and swim across to the p'int o' woods a little below us. Ye got to swim as still as a fish and keep yer flukes under water. I reekon the raft will be an easy tow."

They undressed and put the leashes over their shoulders and when it was quite dark they waded to deep water and stood a moment listening. They heard only a drag of wild geese going over far above them. Their bugling splashed into the silence. The men swam slowly in the black water. When they were half across a great horned owl shot off his arquebus, loaded with scattered shouts, that set weird echoes flying far and wide in the forest. They landed safely, dressed themselves and a little way on lay down for the night.

"We'll go no farther," said Amos. "It's like ridin' a blind jade in bad goin' after dark."

When they lay down at night Robert's thoughts were like a procession of black-robed monks. They delayed and broke his sleep. Often Peggy Weld came tripping into his mind after the monks had passed. The look of her cheered him. He thought much of the puzzle locket now on his neck. He had had no time for its problem since he left the shore. Why had she given it to him? Of course it held a secret of hers that she wished him to know. Had she grown tired of Rosewell? Had she expected that, if defeated in his efforts to open it, he would go back to her and beg for help? Who could tell what deep plan had been in the unusual mind of Peggy? When their hurry was over and they could have a day of rest he would try to learn. But after all it didn't matter now.

So day after day they traveled on. Todkill's ingenious caution kept them out of trouble. More than one incident he mentions in his diary as a providence of God. They came upon a young deer in the edge of a stream, where he had come for water, just slain by a catamount and still warm. Amos dressed the beast and cut off its flesh, salted it and stored it in his back. That evening they discovered a big lake. The old pioneer had seen it from a treetop on a high hill. It lay directly west of them and spread so far north and south that dodging it was not to be thought of. They would go down to its shore and consider what to do. A mile or so from the water's edge was a small wooded island.

"Now, unless we're spied, which the Lord God forbid for his mercy's sake, I reckon we'll get across," said the pioneer. "You leave it to Amos."

He found a fallen spruce about a foot thick. This he trimmed and cut into three lengths with his handsaw. They carried them to the water. Then Amos cut some poles and, laying them across the logs, one by one, lashed them in place. When night fell their raft was ready. A little forward of its middle was a cross space between the poles about a foot wide.

"It's what I call a swim-raft," said Amos. "I'll stand up with a pole and shove it toward that little island till I lose bottom. Then we both lie face down with our arms in the water and paddle dog fashion as fast as we can. If need be I can steer with this pole. There's no wind and I reckon a half-hour's work'll fetch us to dry land."

They made nearly half the distance by poling. When bottom was no longer in reach Amos laid his pole on the raft, rolled his sleeves and got down beside his friend and began to paddle with his hands. The moon had risen. Suddenly they heard a loud puffing in front of them coming nearer.

"It's a moose or a deer that's took water," Amos whispered. "He's traveled the nighest way and is headed right for us."

It was a moose with large antlers and not two fathoms away when Amos lifted his arm and hissed. The moose turned swiftly, heading back toward the island. The raft was almost upon him before he had swung around and got under way.

Meanwhile Amos had been busy. He had slipped his climbing rope off his shoulder. As the moose turned he flung the noose over a side of his antlers and drew it taut. He paid out rope until the moose was at a safer distance and then held fast. The water began to ripple around their raft. They were moving at a good pace. Quickly Amos hauled up close and cut his rope, and the moose drew away. Soon they heard him splashing in shallow water. They drifted to a narrow sandy beach, without an effort, on the impetus that the beast had given them. As they took to their feet Robert suggested that there might be savages on the island.

"No danger o' that," said Amos. "The old moose came from the far shore and crossed this island. If there was redskins here he would never have landed with a drop o' blood in his body."

As they drew up their raft and made it fast under a leaning birch they could hear wolves howling in the distance. Then Amos added: "A pack o' them was after the big beast and he had to take water to save himself."

It was a little island with scarcely an acre of land above water and that thickly overgrown with evergreens and white birch. They found a low hollow in mossy rocks near its middle part on one side of which was a well-roofed cave reaching backward quite two fathoms. Here Amos built a small fire and broiled a good quantity of the deer's flesh in his pack. This they ate with a keen relish. Their store of meat was put on a rack of green sticks over hot coals to dry in the heat and smoke. A wind came up and heavy waves from the west began to break on the island. Lying back comfortably on a blanket, with his pipe going, the old pioneer said:

"I snum! And thanks to the Lord! Amos is happy. Fear has let go o' his hand. It's a blessing o' the good God to have a full belly and a free tongue and a careless foot and no worry. Tonight we can sleep with both our eyes and ears shut."

While their meat was drying they lay under their rock roof, the trees shaking their tops and a sea breaking on the near shore.

Amos began to exercise his tongue in these reflections:

"I've been as uneasy as a pea in a hot skillet—like a bull with a short tail in fly time. The throne o' Satan is in these woods. Ye got to watch out or he'll tear off yer finger nails and put ye in torment. Can't bear to see anyone happy. He drinks blood. When things are goin' too smooth and comf'table he'll start a fight. Old Split Foot will git druv out o' this wilderness. You'll live to see wheat growin' where we've traveled. When we've conquered the wild country and drove his ships off the sea Satan will have to move, but I reckon he'll never give up. He can behave pretty in a palace. He likes to eat and sleep with kings and bishops and lords and ladies."

"Did you ever meet Satan on the high sea?" Robert asked.

"Hell's griddles! Have I met him? Boy! I've et and slept and cursed and clawed and spit and bled with him."

It was one of those rare occasions when Amos was in the mood for communication. When important things were pressing toward his tongue he put away his pipe, bit off a chunk of tobacco and spat freely. His gestures were mostly made with his head. For tense moments it shook nervously. So he began the story of his stern adventures.

"Privateering! That's what they called it, but you might as well say that hell is built o' beeswax and honey. God o' Israel! a gang o' privateers is no better than its captain, and old Cap LaRoche had the soul of a hawk in him. We was in a ram-cat wind on the Mediterranean and lay to in the lee o' an island. We see a man on its shore wavin' to us. We sent a boat to him. He was Capt. John Smith. He had shipped from Marseilles with a lot o' pilgrims bound for Rome. He was a fightin' Protestant. Near this island they threw him overboard. I reckon a gang o' Protestants would have done the like for a Catholic. Smith was a tough stick o' timber. A keen brain and a stout pair o' hands. He could take care o' himself in any crowd with half a chance, give him a slim or a broadsword or the use o' his fists.

"We were lyin' between Corfu and Otranto in the kingdom o' Naples when we spied a Venetian argosy. We knew that she would have a rich ladin'. Old LaRoche made ready and bore down on her. She fired on us, killin' a sailor. That was the thing our captain hoped for. We gave her a broadside. She fled. We used our chase guns and mauled her sails and tackle so that she lay to for action. We grappled and boarded her. She set us afire and got free. Od's blood! It were a hot fight. We shot her sore between wind and water. She began to sink. Then she give in. Again we grappled her. Some o' our hellions was stoppin' the leaks, some guarded the prisoners. The rest o' the gang rifled the ship. We got away with fifteen dead men on our deck and a rich booty o' the finest silks, velvets and cloth o' gold and a great store o' Egyptian, Italian and Turkish money.

"Smith and I quit the pirate ship at the first landin'. We had had enough o' spittin' on the front door o' hell. Some time I'll tell ye what happened to us in the siege o' Regall. There's a story as good as any that Will Shakespeare ever wrote. I'm as tired as a lame grasshopper. Le's go to snorin'."

They covered themselves and were shortly sound asleep.

Amos awoke Robert soon after daylight.

"It's the next day and a good time to cross," said the old adventurer. "There's a fog on the water as thick as smoke in a wigwam. I'll pole the raft in place while you're washin'. Reckon we can hit the west shore afore the fog lifts."

They broke their fast with cornmeal and dried meat and strengthened the lashings on their raft. With his hatchet and saw and knife Amos had prepared some rude paddles more useful than a man's hand in grabbing water. They were soon lying face downward and making better headway then by swimming. At intervals Amos consulted the compass that was corded to his neck and tucked under his shirtband. It was a tedious, long journey. With their paddles under water there was no sound from the raft louder than a faint ripple. Suddenly Amos stopped work and touched his friend's shoulder and shook his head. His ear had caught a faraway splash of paddles.

"Savages are on this water," he whispered. "Lie flat. Don't move a muscle till I tell ye."

Memories Brought Back by Distinctive Perfume

The association of ideas as a spur to memory got another boost the other day when a reporter listened to some fascinating reminiscences of a world traveler. This man was journeying in a leisurely fashion through Switzerland one summer, and being something of a scholar and a collector of odd bits of information, he hit upon an idea that he believed might preserve for him the memory of his travels in undimmed beauty. He purchased a certain pleasing perfume and used it continually on his handkerchief during his travels. About a year or so later he was ready for his experiment and putting some of the same perfume on a handkerchief, he asked his valet to place it near him some time when he was sleeping. He declares that the scheme worked like a charm, that he had a most delightful dream in which the scenes through which he had passed on his travels through Switzerland passed in a series of identical pictures before his vision before he awoke.

Radium Minerals

The principal minerals containing the uranium and therefore radium are pitchblende, carnotite and autunite. The first of these consists of the oxide of uranium, more or less pure, and it is found principally in Czechoslovakia and in the Belgian Kongo. The second is a vanadate of uranium and potassium. It is mined in Colorado, Utah and Australia. The third is a phosphate of uranium and calcium and is mined in Portugal and the United States.

MARION HOWLAND'S DAUGHTER

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

MARION HOWLAND'S boarding house had grown under her capable fingers from a small, six-room dwelling in an obscure part of the city, to a twenty-room old mansion that had once belonged to one of the prominent families in the city. She was a worker of the kind of indefatigability that seems to be fed by the secret springs of a mysterious vitality.

The boarders used laughingly to declare that Marion Howland had some sort of a sixth sense by which she could detect that towels were lacking in Mr. Aver's room; a washstand was leaking in Miss Van Antrip's room; the Gadsby youngster was scuffing the parlor woodwork or that the kitchen plumbing had developed a leak.

With all these earmarks of efficiency for her work, Marion Howland was far from being the conventional landlady. She was a good-looking, well-preserved woman, who showed little of the wear and tear of her nineteen years of widowhood. Many of her boarders even loyally declared that from the rear you could scarcely tell her and her daughter Shirley apart. That, of course, was exaggeration, and Marion Howland was the first to laugh it away as such. She laughed a great deal, and her laugh was infectious. Her boarders enjoyed these strains of her good-humor sounding through the hallways of the house, and as Shirley herself declared, she found her mother a better all-around companion than the majority of the younger people of her own set. And yet this "set" was the pride of Marion Howland's life. It represented the peak of her achievement. It was the realization of one of the brightest of her ideals. Shirley Howland's "set" was one that was planes removed from the realm of the boarding house in which she had been reared.

Marion Howland had steadfastly set out to keep her small daughter's life clear of as much as possible of the environment into which stress of financial circumstance had forced her. When the little Shirley was three years old, Marion was already beginning carefully to see to it that her social affiliations were made outside the boarding house.

The social world into which Marion had married, only to be widowed before she had had time to place her foot on the rung of social advancement, was the one thing she coveted for her daughter. Marion herself had missed it, marrying from her role of saleslady into her brief period as wife of Kenneth Howland, well-known society-man-about-town.

It was extraordinary that in all the lean, even ferocious years of her struggle as a widow, unexpectedly left penniless with a child to rear, how Marion's congenital good nature blossomed and the bloomed. Her struggle in the none too congenial atmosphere of the boarding house had left her unembittered. At forty she was personable, indeed highly attractive, and in no uncertain manner, successful. Her boarding house was known as a first-class, conservative residence for first-class conservative people. Her daughter, eighteen and lovely, had accomplished the miracle her mother had planned for her. Shirley moved in the first social realms of the city. Her friends were the daughters of the town's wealthiest and most exclusive, and never once, in her bright career as a society girl, was Shirley forced to feel inability to cope, in clothes at least, with the performances of her more prosperous girl friends.

Inevitably, of course, there came times when the peculiarities of her environment embarrassed, but there, fortunately again, Shirley was blessed with some of her mother's fine resiliency of spirit. She had audacity, courage, and a fine, but not over-emphasized pride that in many ways helped her somewhat anomalous situation. Shirley had her hearthurts all right, her secret regrets that her home background was not the home background of many of her friends, but no one was ever to know it, least of all her mother, who nevertheless sensed it and sensed it deeply.

It was inevitable then, as Shirley blossomed into adolescence, that from time to time there should occur in the boarding house of shifting scenes and shifting personalities, little situations that were troublesome to Marion and to Shirley alike. For instance, shockingly, it was rumored all over town, that young Hammond Johnson, an architect who had occupied Marion Howland's third-floor front for over a period of three years, had drowned himself of despair over his hopeless passion for the daughter of his landlady, who treated him in the same aloof manner she treated all of her mother's boarders. Calm, courteous, polite.

There had also been the rather difficult situation of Otis Greer, a married man who had boarded with his wife in the Howland house for at least five years, confessing excitedly one night, while in his cups, to a dining room filled with boarders, that he desired to divorce his wife and marry Shirley Howland.

Situations such as these did not make it any easier for Marion to conduct her establishment along the lines she had laid out for herself. An alluring and grown daughter complicated matters. More than that, the boarders were beginning to take on a resentful attitude toward the alleged snobbishness of the daughter of the landlady. Marion, had it been a matter of choosing between the success of her boarding house and the necessity for Shirley to live more closely in its environment, would have sacrificed the former. It was due to her own rigid discipline that Shirley had learned that her world, her mother's choice of world for her, must lie outside the boarding souse.

And in the end, all of Marion's carefully laid schemes for her daughter bore richer fruits than even she had dared to visualize. The sweet Shirley, impeccably lovely at eighteen, met, became engaged to and married, all within ten days, a young radio magnate who at thirty-two, socially secure, and full of the vitality that matched Shirley's, was already regarded as one of the important financial men of the country.

Overnight, Marion Howland's boarding house became a thing of the past, that is, in so far as Marion's proprietorship was concerned. Llewellyn Lewes literally sold his mother-in-law's boarding house over her head, making, as he laughingly put it, a "fat profit." The first year that Shirley was married Marion's son-in-law, with a largesse characterisetic of him in everything he did, settled the modest nest egg of one million dollars upon her. As Marion herself was fond of explaining, it might just as well have been one-tenth that amount, since her senses reeled after the first one hundred thousand mark had been passed.

But Marion Howland, well set-up, attractive, full of energies and interests at forty-five, was thoroughly capable of entering her new estate. She bloomed with happiness in her own well being and in her daughter's. Her son-in-law was congenial to her. The new and dizzying environment of creature comforts in which she found herself was ever gratifying. Also, Marion Howland had known too much of the deprivation of life not to see to it that out of her own empty some of it poured into the empty hands of others.

Marion, being mutually congenial to her daughter and son-in-law, was not permitted out of the regime of their household. The Llewellyn Lewes occupied, along with Marion Howland, a twelve-room suite on the top floor of the most exclusive family hotel in town.

Yet Marion Howland was determined, that with the new life of ease, her interests were not to deteriorate. She determined to keep up her activities, and yet try as she would, there was something about the condition of being relieved from the routine of the running of the boarding house, that left her with a stranded feeling. Part of her credo was to interfere as little as possible in the lives and activities of her two children. She insisted that they travel, go about, regardless of her, and refused to mingle more than casually in their social activities.

One day, when the realization had settled quite definitely uon Marion that she was on her own hands, and that time was beginning to pall, she did a characteristic thing and one that ultimately was to make her, in her own way, as nationally prominent as her son-in-law.

Observing one day during the absence of her son-in-law and daughter on an European jaunt, that the family hotel in which they were living was run along lines that seemed inefficient, she bought the hotel, paid for it one-third cash, and a few weeks later had established herself as proprietor.

That was the beginning of the international hotel series now known as the Howland Chain.

Veteran Explorer Lost His Poise Telling Yarn

Old Mace Liverwurst was sitting on the banister at the Verdigris river bridge last Sunday talking to some of his cronies. They were discussing the feat of the man who went over Niagara falls in a barrel.

Mace said that was nothing—that he and Henry M. Stanley in their travels through darkest Africa went over Victoria falls in a canoe, and just as he made this remark he became overbalanced and fell into the cold water below the bridge. His cronies were greatly excited. Some one ran to a nearby place and got a rope, while another rang the fire bell. Soon quite a crowd had gathered and Mace was blowing bubbles and spouting water higher than a whale could have done. Finally, he was rescued and Mrs. Liverwurst was ready to receive him in her arms as he walked up the slippery bank to where she was standing. Mace assured her that there was no danger.

She led her hero home so he could put on some dry clothing. We asked him the next day if he had noticed any ill-effects from his ice cold plunge, and he replied that he had not, that he hee-hawed for five minutes and said he certainly had the old lady scared for awhile. He said she was glad he was not drowned that she refused to let him deliver the washings this week.

A neighbor woman tells us that Mrs. Liverwurst told her Mace hadn't been returning much money lately when he delivered the washings, and that, maybe, is why she is doing the delivering and collecting. She knows Mace.—Altoona (Pa.) Tribune.

WORLD WAR YARNS

by Lieut. Frank E. Hagan

He "Faded" 30 Generals

His ability with the dice once allowed a buck private of the American army to triumph over more than thirty of his generals. Gypsy Smith, the English evangelist, was a witness to the incident, which establishes its truth.

Smith was an Aquitania passenger when she sailed from Brest in July, 1919. So were thirty-two American generals, a scattering of women war workers and several thousand soldiers and sailors. One night all the officers, and as many enlisted men as could afford to leave their dice game, attended the regular ship's concert, resumed after the war.

The British custom of collecting money for the Home for the Widows and Orphans of British Seamen was adhered to. Gypsy Smith was master of ceremonies.

"This Widows and Orphans Home," the evangelist explained simply to his huge audience of gold braids and enlisted men, "depends entirely on donations such as yours for its support. Your generosity will be appreciated, deep in the hearts of those you help." He paused for contributions.

After some minutes of silence, Smith tried again. And once more none of the thirty-two generals, none of their staffs, not a doughboy or sailor, contributed to the fund. Smith flushed, but his poise remained.

"Of course," the evangelist drawled in his very British accent, "I cawn't beg you, you know. So I'll just say 'Goodby.'"

The evangelist turned toward the exit. But before he reached it a doughboy sprang from his seat. A great roll of real American money was clenched in his grimy hand. He glanced scornfully at the generals and the remainder of the audience.

"Here's somethin' to start the ball rolling," piped the "buck." And he tossed $500 carelessly to the floor of the stage. Then he turned and strode swiftly away, intent on resuming the dice game in which he was already heavy winner.

Deliverance Day

For four long years to Deliverance day, September 13, 1918, the Cure-Doyen of St. Mihiel refused to seek the shelter of a cellar when Allied shells dropped into his occupied city Instead, the plump, genial little man whom many American soldiers met, sat smilingly and even joyfully as German officers who were billeted in St. Mihiel scurried for cover. They were welcome missiles, these Allied shells, to the little priest.

He broke his four-year habit of scorning the dangers of shell fire only when the city was delivered and the Germans who had withdrawn sent back their planes to bomb the houses.

Many stories are related of the cure's conduct during the trying four years. In his study he maintained a collection of shell and shell fragments which had barely missed him. "Little souvenirs of Providence," he called them.

He was suspected by the enemy throughout the period of occupancy. His quarters and his papers were searched countless times for evidence but with definite results upon only one occasion. This was when two French military bicycles, abandoned in 1914, were found secreted on church property. At the same time church decorations, wantonly defaced, were recovered by the cure from refuse dumps and replaced in his church. He promptly wrote upon them an indictment of "vandals."

For this offense the Cure-Doyen was taken across the frontier to Briey for internment. But they kept him there only two and one-half months until, still calm and genial, he was returned to St. Mihiel and the flock he had urged to wait patiently for the far-off day of freedom.

"Made in Germany"

Records of the United States marine recruiting service show that it was necessary to reject a soldier with a glass eye who volunteered for enlistment in the corps at Louisville, Ky.

The man was Paul Gary of Anderson, Ind., near Chicago. He made his application to Marine Sergeant G. C. Wright, who turned him down when it was discovered Gary had one eye that was not "true blue."

"Didn't you know that the loss of an eye would prevent us from accepting you and also keep you from being drafted?" the marine sergeant asked the applicant.

"Sure I did. At least I thought it might," replied Gary. "But you see, this glass eye is the only part of me that was made in Germany and I wanted to take it back there!"

They advised him to mail the eye to Germany.

"Times That Try Men's Souls"

The author of this expression was Thomas Paine. During the Revolutionary war, soon after the British captured Philadelphia, and when the cause of independence was shrouded in gloom, Paine, who was a spirited champion of independence, wrote in "The American Crisis," "These are times that try men's souls."

Big Sister Betty Was Practical

By RUBY DOUGLAS

(©, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
WNU Service.

BETTY JOYCE was a very practical young woman but inasmuch as she had had no training in so-called skilled work, she found it difficult to decide what method should be hers to earn her own living.

"But it isn't immediate—this need to be economically independent," argued her mother.

"No—but I am not getting younger. I am merely wasting time and getting discouraged. I have an idea, but you will all laugh at me."

"What is it?"

"To take what money I have saved up—the few hundreds that I have saved since I was a child and kept my pennies in the red iron bank, my graduation money, Christmas money—you know how I finally got what I have saved, mother—"

"Yes—but what then?" asked her mother.

"I'm going to take a lease on the old Craft house—the one with the wide porch overlooking the little lake? Then I'm going to manage to screen it in, equip it with necessities and start an original little day nursery. I hear my friends complaining always that they could do this or that if it were not for the children to take care of."

Betty's mother's face was lighting up. "There is no doubt of your making a success of anything that has to do with children, dear. You have a real gift. It has proved a great help to me in bringing up Tom and Viola and Mary."

Betty was pleased at her mother's approval.

"I shall have cribs, tables and chairs, a first-class icebox for the milk and feedings of the smaller ones and I shall manage to employ a young girl to help me. I believe I am practical enough to make it pay."

Having made the plan articulate, Betty grew enthusiastic and set about formulating definite arrangements.

"Big Sister Betty" became a necessity in the town—in fact in the trio of towns lying close together, and there was not a day that there was a vacancy in the nursery by the lakeside.

"Hello," said Betty, one morning, over the telephone that stood in the pantry where she worked over milk bottles and fruit juices.

"No—I seem not to know you—no—"

"Oh—" she breathed. "Oh—"

Then she recovered her poise. "But I don't take them that age," she protested. "And that would be after nursery hours," she continued laughing.

On the other end of the telephone stood the mother of the only love Betty had ever known. She and Frank Andrews had been boy and girl sweethearts and, in the way of all such young romance, it had not been without its shadows. They had quarreled and Frank had gone away. Betty, keeping it all to herself, had suffered and not until she had been able to absorb herself in this work, had she been able to find comfort. And now, here was his mother, at his instigation calling her on the phone to say, jokingly, that she had a son to put in the nursery of "Big Sister Betty."

Betty had always been friendly with Frank's mother and perhaps he thought this a safe way to break the ice.

"Perhaps your son would like to come and make his own appointment," suggested Betty, still laughing.

"That's all he wants—Betty, dear," said the anxious mother.

So if Betty laughed a trifle nervously as she played with the babies, it was because she could hardly wait for the moment when she should look once more into the eyes of the man she loved.

At last she found her hand in his.

"I have studied medicine since I went away and am ready to settle down to practice anywhere so long as I can have the promise of you to help me, Betty," he said after a long time.

"But—my nursery. I can't give this all up after I have worked so hard to make it a success."

The man was silent. "Would it not be possible for us to work together? Might we not evolve a plan by which we might both go on with our work and be happy?"

"My idea is that one may do anything one really wants to do," said Betty.

"Then—the question is—do you really want to? Do you still love me—Betty?"

"We'll work together," she made answer.

Makes Wasp-Breeding Pay

There are all sorts of ways of making a living. Stanley Flanders, California entomologist, sells trichogramma, or microscopic wasps, to all the leading orchardists of the Pacific coast.

The wasps are released in the orchards to war on fruit-spoiling insects. According to a correspondent of Country Home, Mr. Flanders has recently improved his rearing methods to the point where he can sell them at a thousand for a cent or $10 a million.

Higher Standards of Living

The economic necessity for maintaining high wages is generally recognized. We must strive for a wage as far beyond the old "subsistence" level of other centuries as our standard of living is higher than theirs.—C llier's Weekly.

Ant a Constant Puzzle to Students of Nature

The ant presents an inexhaustible wealth of delight. Should one have longed to live in the midst of a primitive society, he may literally find one in the ponerine ants of the north—dwellers of the damp sun-flecked soil of our deep woods, and shunners of light.

They live their lives entirely under ground, writes C. Parker Haskins in Nature Magazine of Washington, save for the flying queens and males. They may be seen in midsummer cautiously warming their young under the coolest and dampest of stones. While the larvae lie neglected in the brood chamber, the queens work as do the workers, for the colonies may number but ten or a dozen individuals all told. The members fight among themselves for the spoil scattered half dissected on the floor, as the first humans fought in the early day of man's existence.

The ant offers a wealth of sociological, ethnological and biological problems. What is the tie which binds the advanced ant guest or pet—a vicious parasite in attractive garb—to its host, and enables it to exploit every instinct of its benefactor, while destroying the very brood of its host?

What is the marvelous instinct whereby a parasitic young queen may persuade the workers of the host species to assassinate their own queen in her favor? At what time—certainly in preoligocene years—did the true ant first split from the stock of its mysterious, subterranean wasplike ancestor? How did the ant first come to America, supposing it to have originated to the eastward?

Device Converts Auto Cylinder Into Air Pump

A new device that can be screwed into the spark plug hole of one of the auto's cylinders turns that cylinder into an air pump that will produce two and a half cubic feet of free air per minute. This much air is sufficient to spray oil paint, germicide, insecticide, and liquids, says Popular Science Monthly.

On the down stroke of the piston in the cylinder to which the device is fitted, the piston sucks in outside air through a spring-operated valve. On the up stroke, this valve closes and another opens, allowing the air to flow into a storage tank or into the pipe leading to the spray equipment. If more air is needed than can be obtained from one cylinder in this way, two of the devices can be used at the same time so as to double the output. It is designed to work at an engine speed equivalent to a road speed of 20 miles an hour.

Photographing Wills

Legal circles are concerned, for financial reasons, at the recent innovation by the government in photographing all wills. A supercamera and dark room were provided for the experiment, which is said to have had considerable success in the United States. The photographs of the wills will be placed on the most durable paper, and authorities maintain will outlive the present copies provided by lawyers.

Wings Added to Bicycle

Feathered wings have been added to a bicycle by a mechanic in Austria, who expects to make great speed with the device. A tiny gasoline motor mounted over the front wheel causes the wings to flap by means of a rope and pulley arrangement. The wings have a horizontal as well as vertical motion. The artificial feathers are declared to be weatherproof.

Marshall Co. Fair

Offering to Marshall county and Northwestern Minnesota its greatest variety of entertainment together with outstanding exhibits in all agricultural departments, the stage is all set for the Silver Anniversary Marshall County Fair and Fourth of July celebration at Warren on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, July 2, 3, and 4.

"We want the people of Holt and surrounding territory to come to the Silver Anniversary Fair at Warren next week and enjoy themselves viewing the attractive and educational exhibits and the many first class acts and races to take place before the Grand Stands," said Wm. Forsberg, president of the fair association.

"We feel confindent that we have assembled a greater array of talent than ever before in our effort to please the people of the territory and give them their greatest value."

July 2 will be entry day at the fair with no afternoon program scheduled, while in the evening a complete program will be presented, including races grandstand acts, music, dancing.

Friday, July 3, will be one of the biggest entertainment days of the fair, featuring a big finish wrestling math before the grand stand with Buck Olson, Northwestern Minnesota's most prominent wrestler who has gained national recognition in this sport. Buck's opponent has not yet been seleced but the fair management is lining up for a worth while competitor. This match will take place before the grand stand Friday afternoon. Another big feature on Friday will be the appearance of the Stephen High School Band, in two concerts, both afternoon and evening. This band won district honors in high school band work this spring and were given much favorable comment while participating in the state high school band tournament at the University of Minnesota in May.

Fourth of July will be celebration day in Warren, starting early in the morning and continuing throughout the day and night. At 10 a. m. a big Fourth of July parade will be formed in which large attractive floats, bands and decorated automobiles will compete for prize money totaling more than $150.

At the close of the parade a patriotic Fourth of July program will be presented in one of the city parks with Mayor Gerhard Bundlie of St. Paul delivering the principal address. Mayor Bundlie is an ex-service man and is one of Minnesota's outstanding Legion men. He is at present one of the most popular mayors the capitol city has ever had.

More than 30 horses have been entered in the horse racing program for Friday and Saturday two races being run each day. There are already horses on the track training for the big races.

Some of the grandstand act numbers will include Ed Holter and his laugh provoking mule. Ebenezer; Captain Jack Payne in a sensational 100 foot high dive into a flaming tank of water. Frank Zerado and Vera Patt troupe of Swinging acrobatic stunters: Joseph Blank and Co.,

BUSINESS PITFALLS IN FARM DISTRICTS

Bankers Point Out Hazards of Unsound Practices and Help Farmers to Avoid Them.

WAYS in which bankers may discourage unsound farm practices are described by President F. D. Farrell of the Kansas State Agricultural College in the American Bankers Association Journal. He says:

"In Kansas in connection with the importation of dairy cattle, a large shipment of very inferior animals came into a county to be sold at auction to local farmers. The county agricultural agent informed the bankers that the cattle would be a detriment to the community. The bankers refused to finance the purchase of the cattle and the sale was abandoned. The cattle were shipped to another county. The county agent and the bankers there did as was done in the first instance and the second county escaped.

"A year ago creamery promoters began trying to capitalize the Kansas farmers' desire to improve his markets by inducing communities of farmers to purchase creamery plants before production and local conditions justified them. Informed of this by the State Agricultural College, the bankers association sent warnings to every bank in the state, leading many to refuse to support the creamery promoters until the college approved the plant for the community concerned. This saved many communities loss from the premature establishment of plants.

"A third way bankers can discourage unsound practices is to refuse to finance farmers who wish to pyramid their enterprises, a temptation difficult to resist. This is illustrated among farmers who buy cattle for feeding purposes. A farmer feeds two or three cars of cattle one year and makes a good profit. This induces him to buy twice or three times as many the second year, still more the third and so on until he finally loses more by having too many cattle on feed in a year of bad prices than he made in several previous years with smaller numbers and better prices. When bankers discourage bad practices their action is a positive benefit to the farmers concerned."

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, July 10, 1931. Volume 21; Number 11.

4-H Club Winners

The Holt 4-H Club walked off with eleven prizes at the Marshall County Fair held at Warren last week.

The winners in the Baby Beef Class were: Clifford Moberg, 1st; Reuben Benitt, 2d; Eunice Johnson, 3d; Louis Sagstuen, 4th.

Dairy Calf: Gertrude Voth, 2d; Marlan Augustine, 3d.

Showmanship, Baby Beef: Louis Sagstuen, 3d; Clifford Moberg, 4th.

Dairy Calf, Open Class: Gertrude Voth, 2d.

Sewing: Class B, 2d year: Eleanor Larson, 1st; Doris Leiran, 5th. Miss Larson was awarded a free trip to the Minnesota State Fair in September.

We are proud to see that our local 4-H Club has such splendid work and hope that more folks will encourage this work and also co-operate with the young folks in making the club a success. The News extends its congratulations to the winners.

Hay and Grain Look Good

The farmers have already begun the work of putting up their sweet clover and alfalfa hay. According to reports received here the crops are fairly good and there will be an average yield. The cutting of wild hay will not start for about 8 or 10 days as the crop is rather thin and rather slow in coming. This is due to the fact that the two past dry summers have damaged the wild hay fields by drouth.

Glenn Carlson returned home Sunday from the hospital, where he has been convalescing from a broken arm.

4-H Club To Meet

The Holt 4-H Club will meet the second Tuesday of July, (July, 14th,) at the school house.

The following program will be rendered:-Club Pledge.

New Highway Now Completed

The new highway between here and Thief River Falls is now completed as far as the grading work is concerned and only a little finishing of in spots remains to be done before the roadbed is ready for the gravel.

Bids were let last week for the graveling of the 11.9 miles of this new road and 9,520 cubic yards of gravel will be use to give it a good surface.

H. P. Lund and Sons of Thief River Falls, who built the new road from here south, have secured a shouldering job on the new pavement on No. 8 near Bagley and are moving their outfits there this week.

The Adolphson-Huset company who built the stretch near Steiner have taken a job of grading 1.5 miles of new road and also shouldering 19 miles of pavement on No. 64 between Moorhead and Barnesville.

No 1930 Discount

No discounts will be allowed in the payment of the 1930 taxes at the big title sale commencing Aug. 10, members of the Marshall county board of commissioner decided in a special resolution at a special meeting held in Warren recently, according to Levi Johnson, county auditor.

However, the discounts offered at the tax title sale will be the same as announced in the Sheaf on June 10, when the complete proceeding was announced said Mr. Johnson. The new resolution applies to the 1930 taxes.

The 1930 tax must be paid in full with interest and penalties as provided by law and no discounts will be allowed, the board resolution stated. The ditch liens included in the taxes of 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930 must be paid in full together with interest at six per cent from the due date.

Numerous inquiries regarding the approaching sale have been received by Auditor Johnson and indications are pointing to a successful sale during the period of Aug. 10 to Dec. 31, 1931, which is the final date that the tax titles can be purchased at the low discount rates.—Sheaf.

Ole Moberg of Gatzke was a short caller at the L. Sagstuen home Wednesday evening.

Mr. L. W. R. Webster had his hand and arm badly cut in the saw on Wednesday while sawing some lumber. Ole Moberg of Gatzke took him to the Grygla hospital where several stitches had to be taken.

Messrs. S. O. Beck, W. M. Martin, J. McClaim and G. McGolking of Maxbass, N. D., were visitors at the H. Moberg home Thursday and Friday. They were out looking for hay land in the Mud Lake territory.

N. S. A. News

An increasing number of the Northwest School graduates are attracting not only local, but state-wide attention for special achievements in the production of pure seeds. In talking to these men, it is evident that they have found the work offered in the Agronomy Department of particular value in their regular farm operation.

According to R. S. Dunham, school and station agronomist, the work to be offered during the coming school year will include Cereal Crops, Forage crops Soils and Fertilizers, Farm management, and Agricultural Chemistry. As the department is organized and equipped for investigational work, the results of actual field trials and experiments are made the basis of instructional work. Practical application of the instruction is accomplished in home projects and the distribution of seed of improved crop varieties.

The course in Soils and Fertilizers includes a study of the principles of soil management and the use of fertilizers. Laboratory tests with the student's own soil are carried on in connection with the lectures.

A study of varieties, their adaption, culture and diseases comprises the course in Cereal crops.

In Forage crops, the selection, culture, and identification of such crops is studied chiefly in the laboratory with plant and seed specimens. Farm management surveys and cost accounting studies, based on Minnesota conditions, are largely used in this course.

Lake Project Nears Completion

The Thief Lake restoration project, long hailed as one of the greatest restoration works in the U. S. became an accepted fact with an agreement reached recently at Warren between the two remaining "holdouts" for higher prices, it was announced by W. E. Rowe, attorney for the State Game and Fish department,

The only remaining work to be completed in the project is the building of the final section in the new dam crossing the outlet of Thief River at the lake. Contractors are expected to have this work finished in a very short time.

To Restore Dock

Minnesota's oldest dock, built at Grand Portage in the eighteenth century by the Northwest Company. is to be restored this summer in time for the celebration at Grand Portage on August 22 of the two-hundreth anniversary of the coming to Minnesota of the noted French explorer La Verendrye.

The dock was used for the unloading of the Great Lakes canoes that were piloted to western waters from Montreal with goods for the interior fur trade. On a still day the remains of the old structure, with timbers and stone-filled cribs, can be seen below the surface of the lake, stretching out some two hundred feet with an angle to provide a breakwater.

The restoration of the dock is part of a large plan for restoring old landmarks and Grand Portage and is financed in the interest of the Cook County Historical society by a committee of which Edward C. Gale and Miss Frances Andrews, both of Minneapolis are chairman and treasurer.

Car Smashups

While out driving on the afternoon of the 4th, Walter Sandberg had the misfortune of tipping his new car over on its side when he hit loose gravel on the highway south of Strathcona.

J. O. Johnson and family and Pearl Reierson were riding with Mr. Sandberg when the accident happened but, no one was hurt except the driver who cut his arm on a broken window as he helped put the car back on its wheels.

The only damage done to the car was two broken windows.

Richard Lorentson had a bad car smashup on the 4th in the city of Thief River Falls. It all happened as Mr. Lorentson was returning home from Highlanding and, when he came west over the Squaw Point bridge he was surrounded by heavy traffic on the highway so he was not moving very fast when, a man with an old Dodge came down a side road at a high rate of speed and ploughed into his Chev coupe.

The chev got the worst of it as it was hit from the side and also nose-dived into the road ditch, where it broke the frame, windshield, fenders, radiator, front wheels, headlights and also busted two new tires. It was insured and is now here at the Holt Auto company getting repaired to the extent of about $200 worth of new parts. As for the Dodge, it was more or less of a wreck in the first place and its driver, who appeared to be in best of spirits, was also reckless.

Mr. Lorentson received some bad cuts about the face and had to be taken to a doctor and get his wounds sewed up.

Several autos load of people from here attended the Marshall County Fair and 4th of July celebration at Warren. The fair was bigger and better this year than ever before and, the fair board are to be congratulated for their fine arrangements for high class entertainment for the people of this county.

NEEDED VITAMINS IN WATERMELONS

Real Contribution to the Day's Food Supply.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Did anyone ever need an excuse for eating watermelons? Probably not. But once in a while a mother may be concerned lest this tempting and refreshing fruit is not good food for her children. Now science comes to the support of instinct and tells us that juicy, fine-flavored watermelons make a read contribution to the day's food supply because they contain vitamins, and several other kinds of vitamins, at that.

Laboratory tests have shown that watermelons are a good source of two important viatmins, A and C, and that they contain detectable amounts of vitamins B and G. Vitmain A is needed for growth and physical well-being, while vitamin C is the food factor important in the nutrition of the teeth and some other parts of the body. Vitamins B and G aid in stimulating growth and normal development.

The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture learned these facts by carrying on a series of studies with watermelons of the Tom Watson variety, feeding them to experimental animals. About 90 per cent of all commercial shipments of watermelons are of the Tom Watson variety, and as other red-fleshed varieties are similar in structure and are similarly handled, it is believed that the results of this study apply to the watermelon crop as a whole.

Any mother may therefore feel confident in serving watermelon frequently during the season, that she is providing a wholesome addition to the fruit supply. As with other tempting foods, the "eye may be bigger than the capacity," and some one may indulge a little too freely at the watermelon feast; but this might be true of ice cream or pink lemonade or "hot dogs" or many other foods.

Rhubarb Tapioca Simple Dessert Is Easily Made

Here's a simple, easily made dessert—one of those "mother used to make"—which is sure to be well liked. Nowadays we have quick-cooking tapioca instead of the kind that had to be soaked overnight, but the rhubarb is no different from the kind grandmother grew in her garden. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture furnishes the recipe.

1 quart rhubarb cut in small pieces
½ cup quick-cooking tapioca
¼ tsp. salt
2 cups hot water
1½ cups sugar

Rhubarb Tapioca.

Put the rhubarb, water, and tapioca in the upper part of the double boiler. Cook over steam for 15 minutes, stirring frequently. Add the sugar and salt, and cook about five minutes longer, or until the tapioca is clear and the rhubarb is tender. Chill thoroughly before serving. Plain or whipped cream may be served with this dessert.

Strawberry Ice Box Cake Improves by Standing

If you are among those who prefer strawberry short cake to be made with real cake—not biscuit dough—although there's much to be said for the other variety, too—you will like strawberry ice box cake. It is composed of much the same ingredients as strawberry short cake, but has this advantage, that it improves on standing, whereas short cake, to be perfect, should be served promptly after it is made. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture supplies the following recipe for strawberry ice box cake:

1 tbs. gelatin
¼ cup cold water
½ cup boiling water
1¼ cups sugar
1 quart strawberries, crushed
1 tbs. lemon juice
1 cup cream, whipped
¼ tsp. salt
Sponge cake

Soak the gelatin in the cold water for five minutes. Add the boiling water and the sugar and stir until the gelatin and sugar are dissolved. Mash the berries, add the lemon juice, and combine with the gelatin mixture, and chill. When partially set fold in the whipped cream to which the salt has been added. Chill again, then spread between layers of sponge cake and keep in a refrigerator several hours or overnight before serving.

Keep Blankets Fluffy by Careful Laundering

Fluffy, soft wool blankets can remain fluffy and soft indefinitely if laundered carefully, says the New York state college of home economics at Cornell university.

Wash wool blankets in a lively suds made from a concentrated solution of pure mild soap. The blanket should be gently squeezed with hands or, if a washing machine is used, left in that about seven minutes with the washer at lowest speed. Wet wool should be handled gently. Feed out the blanket, bit by bit, into a pan, looking carefully to see that no spots remain. Squeeze out the water lightly by hand, leaving plenty of water in the blanket. Hang the blanket in the shade and shake it frequently to fluff it while it is drying. A breezy, sunny day is best for drying wools.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

Remove stains from fabrics when the stains are new.

• • •

If the pots and pans and kettles are soaked during the meal it lightens the work of dishwashing afterwards.

• • •

Parents should not have family rows at the table, if only for the sake of not spoiling a child's appetite for food.

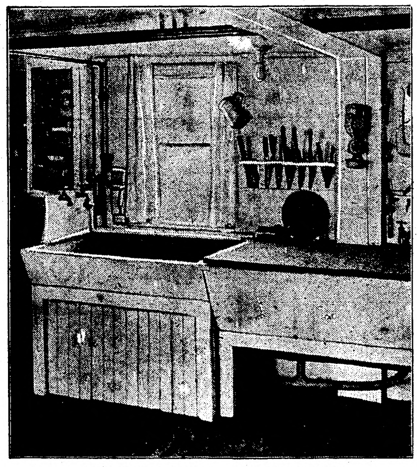
• • •

Clothes closets should be well equipped, well-lighted, and well-used, with convenient racks for shoes, hats and garments.

• • •

Can vegetables as soon as possible after they are brought in from the garden. Flat-sour may develop if vegetables are allowed to stand in a warm kitchen.

IDEAL ARRANGEMENT FOR HOME LAUNDRY



Well Lighted Arrangement of Sink and Tubs.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

While the ideal arrangement for home laundry work is to have a separate room for the laundry equipment, this is often impossible. Space for tubs, washing machine, ironing board, and laundry supplies must be provided in the kitchen. When this is necessary it is advisable to group the laundry equipment in such a way that food preparation and laundry work will not interfere with each other.

The picture shows a farm kitchen in Massachusetts where the tubs have been set next to the sink, for convenience in placing water and drain pipes, and also because of the good light from the window and the door opening on the back entry. The tubs are provided with a cover which can be used as a worktable. Such a cover may be hinged, but if there are projecting articles on the wall behind it such as the coffee mill and kitchen utensils shown in the illustration, it is probably better to lift it off entirely when the tubs are required. A piece of linoleum has been fitted to the cover in this kitchen, for easier care and imperviousness to water and grease.

It would have been better, if possible, to put the faucets for the tubs inside instead of above them, not only to get them out of the way but to prevent any annoyance from dripping, suggests the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. This bureau has made a study of both kitchen and laundry equipment and is interested in placing both to eliminate unnecessary labor and shorten the time spent in these work rooms by the homemaker.

DAIRY

CALF STARTER IS MADE AT CORNELL

Dry Mixture Gives a Good Growth and Is Cheap.

Eliminating entirely the troublesome task of heating water to mix with calf feeds, the new "calf starter" devised at the New York State College of Agriculture has proved successful in tests at the college, according to Charles H. Crawford of the department of animal husbandry. Calves have been grown to six months of age at a total cost of $36 by using the new dry mixture, and but 325 pounds of whole milk was fed during the first 17 weeks.

The mixture contains 320 pounds of ground yellow corn, 320 pounds of rolled oats, 320 pounds of winter wheat bran, 160 pounds of linseed meal, and 880 pounds of dry skim milk. The calves were fed the calf starter for the first 16 weeks when they were changed to a cheaper concentrated mixture called the heifer ration. The heifer ration has 800 pounds each of ground yellow corn, ground oats, and wheat bran, and 100 pounds of linseed oil meal.

Both of these feeds gave good growth and are cheap, Mr. Crawford says. The calf starter was limited to five pounds and the heifer ration to four pounds daily. Hay was fed liberally.

The new feed is not sold commercially, but a letter to the animal husbandry department of the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca, N. Y., will bring details of the plan and the feeding schedule.

Chance for Quick Calf Profit Seen on Ranges

Creep feeding is applied to calves the same as to pigs or lambs and is especially adapted to corn belt farms. It also is being practiced successfully on the ranges and especially on the native pastures of Kansas, says R. R. Thalman of the University of Nebraska.

According to recent tests, an April calf creep fed will consume an average of six bushels of grain. This will add approximately 60 pounds to his weight by market time. Should the calf sell for 10 cents a pound, the extra weight would return $1 a bushel for grain fed. In addition to increased weight, creep fed calves sell from $1 to $2 a hundred higher than similar calves not fed grain while receiving milk. Should more finish and weight be desired before marketing, creep fed calves may be placed in dry lot after weaning for a short period. Usually 80 to 90 days will prove sufficient to put them in top finish for the fat cattle market. Such animals meet with a ready demand at any season and returns will more than meet the extra labor or cost involved. Well bred calves of good quality should be the aim for creep feeding.

Well Constructed Tank Efficient for Cooling

According to tests at the state experiment station at Geneva, N. Y., cooling in well-constructed farm tanks is easier and equally as efficient from a sanitary point of view as cooling over an aerator. The electric refrigerators now being offered for sale for use on dairy farms are practical and reliable. Whether the farmer uses a tank of the old style using ice or one of the new ice machines, the tank should be large enough so that when filled with cans of milk there will be twice as much ice and water as milk. A tank 35 inches wide, 60 inches long and 26 inches deep has a capacity of six cans. When the six cans are in, there are two gallons of water and ice for each gallon of milk.

Dairy Facts

Testing opens the way to sound business dairying.

• • •

Carelessness in feeding increases milk production costs.

• • •

Recent experiments have indicated that acids contained in silage are not harmful to cows.

• • •

Prevent the growth of horns in calves by using a caustic stick which you can buy from your druggist.

• • •

The dairy cow herds will show their appreciation by increased cream checks to owners who do a good job of putting up alfalfa hay for next winter's feed.

• • •

The first rinse of milk utensils should be with cold or lukewarm water as hot water will cause the milk to "cook on."

• • •

Unless the customary feed is given to dairy cows in mild weather as well as in severe weather, production will fall off sharply.

• • •

Raise calves from only the very best cows. It is better to veal all calves unless their blood inheritance makes it possible for them to develop into good cows.

A Candle in the Wilderness

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

by IRVING BACHELLER

WNU Service
Copyright by Irving Bacheller

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon leave England in 1634 for the New world. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear. Heydon is apprehended and, refusing to talk, is found guilty. Heathers and Todkill head for New Amsterdam and suspicion begins to point to the former. Belief grows that Heydon is shielding his friend.

They lay motionless with strained ears. Soon they could hear plainly the stroking of at least a dozen paddles, then deep raucous voices that reminded the young gentleman of the grunting of swine. In a moment the fleet of canoes could not have been more than a bowshot away. Their luck was now getting its severest test. They could only lie still and await the issue. Robert felt a pain in the hand that held his paddle. His muscles were tense, and the pressure of his hand had increased with his peril. The sounds came nearer and suddenly began to recede in the distance behind them. The fleet had passed, bound for the east shore. Fortunately they had not come near enough to be visible. The sounds grew fainter and were soon out of hearing.

Amos laughed under his breath and then whispered: "The devil and his dogs! Was ye skeered?"

Robert answered: "I shook like a shirt in the wind. Were you?"

"Boy, I won't lie to ye. I was skeered to spit for a minute. I were a bit cold and I sweat like a pitcher full o' ice."

They put their strength to the paddles and in half an hour or so they saw a thickly wooded shore looming out of the fog. They made their way through dry dead timber to a landing. There they left the raft, put on their packs and pushed through a thicket and up a long slant to the top of a high ridge, above the mist, where a grateful breeze came out of the west. Near them a landslide had gone down the steep rock slope with an acre of timber in its arms. There they could look out upon a great spread of country covered with vari-tinted verdure. It is likely that no white man's eye, save theirs, had seen its wild beauty.

"Look there!" Amos whispered. "No end to it! I reckon it's like it were when God divided the light from the darkness and set the stars in heaven."

"And think of the strange wild beauty of this scene and for ages untold no eye to see it but God's."

Amos took his two books from his wallet. One was filled with notes and maps. He passed it to Robert, saying: "Sit down here and read my diary whiles I go on with the map in this other book."

So it befell that Robert read the full particulars of Todkill's meeting with John Samp. Amos had been thoughtless in the matter. For the young man now reading them, those pages were full of soul fire. A thing had happened which he could not have foreseen. He had never dreamed that his going would put his friend in peril. He had supposed that his disappearance would be accepted as a confession. The cont, the unexpected testimony of the woman and William's unaccountable wandering in the woods had defeated his purpose. He had felt sure that the woman would have sense enough to hold her tongue. He sprawled on the ground writhing in distress of mind. Amos saw it and came to his side.

"What's the trouble, boy?" he asked.

"My friend—my best friend—is in danger of the gallows. He may be dead now," Robert answered.

"Don't worry. To begin with, the word of a tipsy constable is not worth a cracked farthin'. I wouldn't give a penny's worth o' the day for all his talk. If William is convicted, why does he come after you? But suppose that Samp told the truth, they will not hang William."

"Why?"

"They don't believe he did it. That's why the court has sent for you. They say you must be the guilty man or ye wouldn't have run away on the tavern ship. You've got the reputation o' bein' a devil with the gals. I don't know how ye got it. Probably from the busy tongues o' the women. You like a joke better than mutton. William is straighter-faced. He can laugh, but he looks and talks more like a godly man. Every one likes him. He's as friendly as a house cat. He's round and you're four-cornered. Folks may like ye or not. The whole town is sure that he is not guilty and that you be. That's why the old tub Samp come up the shore to nail us. You needn't worry 'bout William. They'll never hang him. Too many friends amongst the great men. There's some that's harm-proof. He's one of 'em."

These words were a comfort to the young man.

"I don't know what to do," he said. "We cannot go back."

"Back!" Amos exclaimed. "Hell's griddles! No! I'd rather try to dodge the Mohawks—thick as flies in midsummmer, savage as a bear with cubs, and get to some Dutch town. We've had luck in gettin' here. We'd never get back. I reckon we'll make the big lake in two days and a sleep. In this moon I feel the suck o' the south on me. We'll try our luck in the Mohawk country. There's water most o' the way down to the big Dutch island. If ye take my advice ye'll keep away from the colony leastways till winter weather has cooled 'em off. I reckon we better take a ship for Holland if we can sneak through."

"We'll go south, if you think there's a chance to get through," said Robert. "I wish we had tried the sea."

"Ye might as well sing a psalm over a dead horse," Amos answered. "We'll get out o' this puppy snatch. Don't worry."

"I Am Myself Convinced That He Is Guilty."

The old pioneer had a different sort of comrade to deal with now—one who had suddenly changed from a confiding youth filled with a boy's relish for adventure to a stern-faced man.

"Come on," he said. "We'll take another shoemaker's holiday."

CHAPTER VI

A Seething Broth and the Pot That Held It

Robert Heathers' concern for the safety of his friend William was well founded. Nearly five weeks passed. The constable had not returned. Word came that his overturned shallop had been discovered and that Samp was drowned. Heathers had got away. The riffraff was laughing at the court, declaring that the law was only for the poor. Everywhere, except with Sir Harry Vane and the Lady Bess, feeling ran high against William Heydon. He felt it in his prison.

William wrote to Roswell Brade offering the Lady Bess her freedom and even urging that she take it.

"I can never love another woman," he wrote, "but it may be that she can love another man. She was born for happiness, and it is her duty to find it."

Brade came to see him and asked him pointblank for the truth. William did not answer the question.

Returning from the prison, Mr. Brade called his wife and daughter into council. He said: "The more I study the matter the darker it becomes. William will give me no light. Why? If he is innocent and is trying to shield his friend Robert Heathers, why can he not confide his secret to me? He should know that I would not betray it. The posture of the case is critical. If he confessed now he would go to the gallows. He may go to the gallows without confession. These magistrates are stern men. I have conferred with one of them today. He feels that their evidence warrants the pain of death."

"I say again, steadfastly, that I believe him innocent," said Bess.

"But you are almost alone in that. I am myself convinced that he is guilty. We are humiliated by our association with this man who, if he is not guilty, does not trust us with the truth. Guilty or innocent, as I have said before, he is disgraced. There is but one thing for us to do. We must get away from these troubles and go back to England for a time. You and your mother are in such a nervous condition that living with you has become a burden. We must get away from these deplorable excitements or we shall all be dead."

For a time the girl stood against these convictions renewed and amplified day by day for a week. She called Sir Harry Vane to her aid but to no avail. Her father would not be persuaded by his arguments. Roswell Brade was an able and a stubborn gentleman. He appealed to her pride and her sense of gratitude. He was slow to use his authority as the head of the house, and it must be remembered that in the Seventeenth century it was a power to which women were wont to yield without question. They might think of independent action, but if so they did it secretly.

Bess had to yield at last, and so it came about that this letter was written:

"My dearest: I love you. As long as I live I will love you, yet our ship is wrecked. Its freight of happiness is lost. If I could have my way I would stay here and do what I can for you. But you give me no rock to stand upon, and I am nearly drowned in these chilling waves of opposition. We get no assurance from you that the disgrace you suffer is undeserved. Mine are a proud and stern people. What have I to sustain me in opposing them save my faith in you? Your words to me—how are they to be interpreted? What can I do but bend to the will of my parents and return to my home in England and cherish a memory of days and of a face dearer than all others? I cannot blame my father, for when I search by own heart I find in it a degree of pride. It is a thing born in me. I cannot help it. If it be wrong, I ask my God to forgive me. I ask also that He will give you strength and comfort according to your need.

"Sincerely your friend,
"Elizabeth Brade."

Thus gently and truthfully the Lady Bess broke with William Heydon and surrendered when the battle was by no means lost. However, it must be said that she could not foresee what was coming. William laid no blame upon her. He knew too well the pride of the born aristocrat. She had resisted it for a time but it was bound to have its way. Soon after the Brades took a ship for England.

Meanwhile the clamor of the people for justice grew. Something had to be done. Again William faced the stern magistrates. He only asked for mercy and refused to plead. He would neither deny nor affirm his guilt. The magistrates were confronted by a new and a highly serious problem. In England the penalty for refusing to plead had been the pressing machine designed to convince the felon of his error or, failing in that after a severe pinching, it proceeded to destroy him. No enlightened person in the colony could countenance that kind of practice. Was not the presser a tool of the spirit from which they had fled? Indeed certain of their kin had suffered death in its embrace. The magistrates retired for deliberation. The evidence was in their view conclusive. A sufficient majority agreed that the prisoner should die on the gallows. They returned to deliver their verdict. Sir Harry Vane was in court. He saw in their faces the doom of the prisoner. He consulted a moment with Winthrop and Dudley, who entertained a high regard for the baronet. His handsome face and figure, his magnetic personality, his brilliancy and good sense, together with the prestige of his family and the eminence of his father had made him a power to be reckoned with in spite of his liberal Puritanism too advanced for the taste of certain churchmen. Even the fishermen took off their hats in his presence, while goodmen and gentlemen agreed that he should be the next governor.

Judicial Ear Inured to Lies on Witness Stand

Perjury, writes a columnist in the Manchester (Eng.) Guardian, is a very terrible thing, but perjury is not, as may have appeared from recent comment, more in evidence now than in the past. It is a good many years since Commissioner Kerr made his dry comment while presiding in the City of London court: "David said in his haste all men were liars; if he were sitting in this court he would have said the same thing at his leisure."

To the past also belongs the even drier remark of Mr. Justice Byles: "A man's word in the city of London is as good as his bond—but you can't stamp it." And quite mid-Victorian was the reply of Justice Maule to a man who declaimed, "My lord, you may believe me or not, but I have stated not a word that is false, for I have been wedded to truth from my infancy."

"Yes, sir," growled Maule, "but the question is how long have you been a widower?"

Life Sentence Is Given Boy Killer

17-Year-Old Student Lapses From Model Youth to Brutal Murderer.

Haverhill, Mass.—Russell B. Noble, seventeen-year-old high school student who lapsed overnight from a "model" way of life to become a housebreaker who did not balk at murder, has been lodged in solitary confinement at the state prison at Charlestown on a life term sentence for the murder of Mrs. Clara E. C. Ellis, wealthy Harverhill widow, last February.

Noble's entry as a "lifer" into the gray-walled institution came as the climax to a swiftly moving series of events set in motion when the youthful defendant, suddenly abandoning his plan of contesting the state's case, appeared in Superior court at Lawrence and calmly pleaded guilty to second degree murder.

The plea being acceptable both to the court and to District Attorney Hugh A. Cregg, Noble was given the sentence prescribed by the law, life imprisonment at Charlestown.

Only One Younger.

The cool, self-possessed youth whose jaunty air and serene, almost smiling countenance, remained with him throughout the court proceedings and until some minutes after the gates of state prison had clanged behind him, entered the institution as the second youngest person ever committed there on a life sentence.

Among the thousands of men sentenced to life terms at the institution, only the notorious Jesse Pomeroy was younger than Noble at the time of commitment. Pomeroy, at first was sentenced to death and later receiving a commutation to life imprisonment, was just over sixteen when committed, while Noble is about seventeen and one-half years old.

Evidently intent on preserving his cool poise to the end, Noble, handcuffed to an officer of the Lawrence jail, smiled wanly as he was hustled up the steps of the prison and passed within the door to the outer office. A few minutes later, his smile and characteristic equanimity deserted him when a prison officer, putting him through the usual questions for newcomers, asked him about his mother and father, both of whom are dead.

Guilty Plea a Surprise.

Tears welled up in his eyes and he was unable to answer immediately, but after being allowed to sit down for a while he was able to submit once more to the interrogation.

The plea of guilty to second degree murder by Noble came as a distinct surprise to all except a few officials and friends. It came as a shock to a great number of supporters of the youth who had maintained faith in his innocence notwithstanding his alleged confession to the hammer slaying, made soon after his arrest and later repudiated.

Announcement that he would appear for arraignment was made a few hours before his appearance in court, with the result that no great crowd was on hand to witness the brief court scene, enacted swiftly and without dramatics.

Manacled to two other youths due to stand trial, he was taken to the court house where he was arraigned before Judge Louis S. Cox.

At the conclusion of the reading of the indictment the clerk called upon Noble to plead, and the defendant, replying in calm, clear voice, said, "I plead guilty to murder in the second degree."

Plea Is Accepted.

His attorney, Mr. McCormick, rose and said, "Your honor, I approve of his plea and respectfully request the court to accept it." District Attorney Cregg then addressed the court.

"May it please your honor," he said "never in my experience have I been called upon to make such a serious decision. Mrs. Ellis was a widow, thirty-nine years old, living in Haverhill, and she enjoyed a splendid reputation. Noble entered her home, went to her room, and struck her with a hammer three time and caused her death. He went there with the intent of committing larceny. He had tried to get into another home, but had failed. He knew Mrs. Ellis, he knew she had money, and he did steal a watch. I regard Noble as an exceptionally bright boy. He was the leader of his class in school and previous to this event had a spotless reputation.

"I feel that he is guilty of murder in the first degree, but because of his previous reputation, and because of his youth, and because we know that juries are human and that we might have some difficulty in securing a first degree murder verdict, I recommend acceptance of this plea."

Judge Cox paused for a moment and then said: "I accept the plea." Cregg immediately moved for sentence and the judge proceeded to impose the statutory penalty.

"I have no discretion in the matter of sentence—life imprisonment," he said simply.

Cafe Man Will Sue England for Isle

Rome.—If Guido de Lusignamo, who runs a little cafe at Varallo Sesia, can get sufficient support he will immediately start proceedings against the British monarchy with a view of wresting from it the Island of Cyprus; against the Zionist government for Jerusalm, and against the Turkish republic to return Aremnia to him.

He says his ancestor who held the title of Leone XIII was the rightful owner of these territories, and that he had never given up his rights to them. He now wants the property turned over to him.

London's Criminal Elite Are Now Listed in Book

London.—The murderer of tomorrow will walk from the death cell onto the gallows and then into crime's "Who's Who," the first issue of which has appeared here.

The little book contains a tasteful review of the major crimes in Great Britain during 1930, and came as an innovation to a nation that has for years merely hanged slayers and forgot about them.

The author, Robert Curson, in a preface describes it as "The Crime Annual for 1930—the forerunner, it is to be hoped, of many such volumes." Scotland Yard, however, it is learned, believes the literary world would survive if the material for the next issue weren't available.

The machine gun murders in United States' ganglands are always the subject of front-page interest here, as are the sporadic killings in the various parts of England.

The book reviews all violations of the law, from blackmail to murder, and includes the failure of the Hatry companies in which millions of investors lost heavily. The convict who leaped to death over a prison wall rather than face "the cat" (the lash) gets a place in posterity.

Buffalo Coming Back But on Alaska Range

Washington.—Buffalo, which once swept in vast herds across the western plains, now promise to muster their lost numbers in a distant range—the lowlands of Alaska.

A small band of buffalo transferred from the biological survey's Montana bison range in 1928 is reported to have increased to a herd of 29, says a bulletin of the American Game association. Their new home is in a grassy region southeast of Fairbanks.

Homes of Cave Dwellers Are Unearthed in China

Peiping.—Possible habitations of Chinese cave dwellers have been uncovered by a Chinese expedition at Changteh, in Honan province, according to reports received here. Several deep pits containing bones and earthenware were excavated. They confirm the statement of Mencius, the Chinese philosopher, that early Chinese peoples "made nests for themselves in the highlands and in the lowlands they made caves."

NEW TREATMENT TO BANISH RICKETS, DOCTOR'S CLAIM

Milk From Cows Fed Irradiated Feed Not Only Preventive but Cure.

Philadelphia.—That rickets, a bone disease affecting more than 50 per cent of all infants, can be banished by using milk from cows fed feeds irradiated with ultraviolet rays, was the announcement made by Dr. Alfred F. Hess of New York, an international authority, before the American Medical association here.

Doctor Hess, for many years clinical professor of diseases of children at the University and Bellevue hospital medical college, told of the recent experiments with one hundred babies conducted by himself and his associates—Dr. J. M. Lewis and Dr. F. L. MacLeod, both of New York and Dr. B. H. Thomas of Iowa State college—whereby it was conclusively proven that rickets can be not only prevented but cured by the process of using the milk produced by cows which have received a special ration part of which was irradiated with ultraviolet rays.

This discovery and announcement is important, Doctor Hess suggests, because it points the way to the elimination of rickets on a large scale; that is, from the public health standpoint rather than through the individual. The chief difficulty with present methods of treating rickets is that they require the close co-operation of the mother and the physician in each individual case. If by the simple process of using milk from cows fed irradiated feed, infants and young children can be automatically freed from rickets as Doctor Hess' demonstrations indicate, a big advance has been made in the elimination of this bone disease which is so widely prevalent in the United States.

"Rickets is the most common nutritional disorder of infants in the temperate zone," says Doctor Hess. "Although it has decreased in incidence and severity it is still true that more than 50 per cent of infants suffer from this disorder to a greater or less degree. There are various remedies available for the prevention or cure of rickets, for example viosterol, cod liver oil, milk treated with ultraviolet rays and direct exposure of the infant to these rays. The main criticism of all these agents is that they require the co-operation of the mother; some likewise are difficult to give, expensive or time consuming."

French Medical Academy Asks for More Monkeys

Paris.—The Academy of Medicine has asked the government to provide more monkeys to prepare sufficient serum to fight the yellow fever in Africa. The government asked the academy to increase its production of serum. The academy replied by a short letter saying: "Give us more monkeys first."

Italian Bees Are Most Excellent

Superior to German Type and Gather More Honey in Course of Year.

The queen is the "better half" of the bee family. All efforts of the beekeeper bring only failure unless there is a good queen in the hive, according to B. A. Slocum of Cornell university. "No matter how good our equipment, how well we have packed the bees for winter, how generous we are with winter stores of honey and sugar, or how abundant the nectar in the blossoms, the swarm cannot make a large crop of honey," he said, "unless the queen is able to maintain a large colony of strong, active, and healthy bees."

Italian Bees Superior.

Beekeepers, Mr. Slocum said, believe Italian bees are much superior to the German bees, commonly known as black bees, in nearly all respects. They are better workers, swarm less, are more gentle, and are much superior in cleaning out European foulbrood. Unfortunately the black bee was introduced into the United States more than two hundred years before the Italian bee, and therefore the blacks have become fairly well established in all parts of the country. They are now found wild in trees and rocks in every state from coast to coast, and in many parts of Canada. Consequently, one very good reason why beekeepers should rear their own queen bees, or secure them from reputable breeders, is to get rid of the black bees and hybrids.

Prolific Queen Needed.

Every colony must be headed by a good prolific queen. Authorities agree there is not so much difference in the honey-getting ability inherited by the different colonies as there is in the condition of the colonies; that is, they produce large honey crops because conditions within the hives are ideal. This means a large number of strong young bees in healthy condition, with conditions around the hive suitable for them to work effectively. The good queen is extremely prolific and lays around 2,000 eggs a day. Such a queen must be large and should have a deep body. A great number of eggs is necessary because the amount of honey made by the colony varies directly with the number of strong young bees in it.

Tremendous Increase in the Use of Oil Sprays

The use of oil sprays in the East has increased tremendously during the last ten years, mainly because of the prevalence of the European red mite. In consequence, other problems have arisen, such as the combination of oils with fungicides and aphicides which have in turn reacted upon the oil spray business so that better oils are being marketed than ever before. The great variety offered has complicated the proper selection of oil sprays and careful consideration on the basis of cost, safety, toxicity, reliability and compatibility is necessary. Much experimentation is needed in this field. Commercial oil emulsions have not proved to be better killing agents than miscible oils for red mites, a fact which deserves consideration, and, finally, studies of safety of the various products so far indicate caution for pears and plums, together with additional caution on all fruits for the unknown product, especially if the formula is new.

Miscible Oil Must Be Thoroughly Emulsified

Miscible oils and various oil emulsions being manufactured from kerosene and the heavier mineral oils, it is necessary that an emulsion of good quality be produced in order that the oil may be dispersed uniformly through the diluted spray. If the oil separates out, injury to the tree may ensue.

Two types of emulsions are available, one in which the oil is emulsified with soap and cresylic acid or soap alone; the other a nonsoap emulsion in which the oil is dispersed by means of casein or some other protein agent. The latter may be termed a quick breaking type and may be expected to give more trouble than the other.

Excellent Method for Preparing Grafting Wax

There are several rules for making grafting wax. An old method found excellent is as follows:

Four parts by weight of resin, two of beeswax and one tallow. Melt slowly, being careful not to let it boil over on the stove. When thoroughly mixed, pour into cold water, and, as soon as it can be handled, work with greased hands like molasses candy. Make into sticks of convenient size for handling. In any ordinary grafting weather this wax will soften sufficiently to be plastic by the heat of the hand.

Control Pea Aphis

Pea growers have on occasion suffered considerably from heavy infestations of pea aphis. These tiny insects increase with incredible rapidity and a good many times it seems as if there is very little that can be done to control them. However, the New Jersey experiment station reports a successful control by dusting with a dust made of 50 pounds of hydrated lime and three pints of Black Leaf Forty mixed and applied immediately.

Kill Queen Ant to Get Rid of Pests

Poison Is Suggested to Kill Off Whole Army.

The best way to get rid of ants is to find their nests and to destroy the queen, according to Prof. Glenn W. Herrick of the New York State College of Agriculture. With the queen killed, no more eggs will be laid and the production of the worker ants stops.

Carbon bisulphide kills the queen and gets rid of the workers. It may be difficult to find the nest, and sometimes when the nest is found it is hard to get at, as in the foundation walls. When the colony is located, however, pour an ounce or two of the liquid into each of several holes made in the nest with a sharpened stick, and then quickly stop up each hole with a clod of dirt. A heavy wet blanket thrown over the nest helps to retain the gas and to make fumigation more effective. The liquid evaporates quickly and the gas permeates the whole nest, destroying the colony. Carbon bisulphide is highly inflammable and explosive and no fire should be brought near the place which is being fumigated.

Professor Herrick also recommends the use of tartar emetic. To make this, mix tartar emetic with extracted honey at the rate of one part to twenty parts of honey. If some of this mixture, pourned into individual butter plates, is set in the places where the ants are troublesome, the insects may be driven away.

Every Farm Yard Loses Much Needed Fertility

Every farm yard has fertility going to waste. It may be little; it may be much. Every piece of undiseased vegetation is the source of fertility if it is properly saved. Every bit of vegetable matter left over or not used in the preparation of feeds or foods would make the greens grow greener in the garden or the flowers grow more beautiful if converted into fertility and properly used.

In other words, select a spot somewhere within easy reach and make a compost pile of all the vegetable tops, leaves, straw butts, cornstalks, unconsumed hay and so on. Mix in a little good soil; incorporate into the pile as it is made some commercial fertilizer materials; keep it moist if water is available and you will have some excellent fertility to apply to choice spots in the garden, lawn or other part of the farm. Use fertilizer in somewhat the following proportions: To each 100 pounds of dry vegetable matter such as above mentioned, mix in three pounds each of sulphate of ammonia and air slaked lime, and one pound of superphosphate.

Unique Way to Prevent Injury to Grape Crop

Perhaps the best way to avoid injury to grapes from bees consists of spraying the grapes and in growing the grapes to the ripening stage without punctures or injuries. Following this, of course, the grapes should be harvested promptly when they are ripe. If for any reason the grape berries are allowed to hang on the canes and become over-ripe, much injury is liable to occur from bees.

We may summarize by saying that we should grow the grapes in the best possible way in order to secure a high quality, firm, well ripened berry, says a writer in the American Horticulturist. If they are not allowed to become over-ripe, little or no injury will occur from bees.

FARM FACTS

One-year-old trees are the best trees for planting.

• • •

Potato spraying should begin early and continue late.

• • •

Purslane is a villainous weed, but not to be despised when boiled as "greens."

• • •

Bonemeal is excellent for vines and all garden purposes, and may be used freely without danger of burning.

• • •

Quack grass is one of the earliest plants to start growth in spring and it grows until freezing weather in the fall.

• • •

High-producing cows frequently suffer a severe strain on their calcium reserve, and need to have that reserve replenished.

• • •

Heavy pasturing over long periods readily shows that the returns in grass gradually diminish and that the feeding value of the feed is reduced.

• • •

Cherry leaf spot is the most important single disease of the sour cherry. It is caused by a fungus which passes the winter in the dead leaves on the ground.

• • •

When transplanting a tree be sure to maintain a balance between the root system and the top. If you lose part of the roots cut back the top correspondingly.

• • •

Thousands of raspberry, currant, and gooseberry bushes are loafing on the job of producing fruit because they are not given an annual pruning to cut out the nonbearing wood.

WEED OUT POOR COWS TO CHECK BUTTER SURPLUS

Use of More Dairy Products by Farmers Would Boost Butterfat Prices.

Use of more of their own products by dairymen and their families, immediate weeding out of the two poorest producers among every eighteen "cream" cows, and the application of newer farm production methods to the dairy business, are the "three points" of the remedy suggested by the De Laval Bureau of Dairying to overcome the surplus butter situation which today confronts the dairy industry.

The immediate cause of the situation is the presence in the nation's cold storage warehouses of approximately 40,000,000 more pounds of butter than is considered normal. This surplus is being reflected in the price of butter, which in turn is having its effect on the price received by the farmer for his butterfat.

Dairy Profits Steady.

"Of all the branches of agriculture," says the De Laval Bureau, "dairying is one of the steadiest, year after year. Wherever good farm management is used profits are notably constant. Occasionally, however, a factor like the 40,632,000 more pounds of butter in storage this year over the same period last year, is causing some farmers to believe that the dairy business is being overdone. This need never be the case since the dairy farmer himself can wield a powerful influence on a number of factors affecting the production and cost of dairy products.

"Forty million extra pounds of butter seems a huge amount, but the people living on farms alone could consume this amount in less than six weeks by merely eating the amount of butter recommended for health's sake by the National Dairy Council and advised by nutrition authorities—two pounds per person per month. At this same rate of consumption farm folks themselves in another eleven weeks would consume all of the butter in storage and not leave a single pound for trade.

Weed Out Boarders.

"But perhaps the most effective measure dairymen hold in their own hands is cutting down the number of milk cows to those which are profitable producers. There are approximately 10,000,000 cows in the United States that are kept for the production of butterfat. Of this number of 'cream' cows, almost 500,000 are out and out money losers. They not only represent a loss of feed to their owners but at present produce just enough butterfat to create an excess supply and force down market prices. The disposal of one out of every eighteen of these 10,000,000 cream cows, or better still, the weeding out of the two poorest producers among every eighteen cows, will automatically prevent any excess storage stock over normal. There has never been a more favorable time for culling out the money-losers and selling them for beef, which is now bringing good prices.

"The temporary accumulation of butter in storage was undoubtedly the cause of the drop in the price paid for butterfat. But for every cent drop in price an equal amount could be saved through better feeding. Raising as much low-cost, high-protein feed on the farm as possible is a commendable practice that works toward this end. Another is for every farm, whether selling whole milk or not, to separate enough cream for home use and provide skimmilk for feeding calves, hogs and poultry."

Annual Crop and Soils Day

The date for the annual Crops and Soils day at the Northwest School and Experiment Station, Crookston, has been set for Monday, July 20. Special features of the day will include the annual meeting of the Red River Valley Crops and Soils association, timely lectures on problems confronting farmers and pure seed growers of the Northwest, and an inspection of the Station fields and plots.

H. R. Sumner, secretary of the Northwest Crop Improvement association, will deliver the principal address, his subject being "Market Requirements for Cereal Crops. Other crops and soils authorities who will be in attendance include Dr. H. K. Hayes and Dr. H.K. Wilson, University Farm, St. Paul; E. R. Ausemus, from the United States Department of Agriculture; Dr. E. G. Booth, extension agronomist, North Dakota Agricultural College; together with county agents, leading farmers, and pure seed growers of the Northwest.

R. S. Dunham, station agronomist, will have charge of the inspection of the station experimental plots, and will explain the new cereal varieties, new varieties of sweet clover, and forage crops, the effects of fertilizers on crop yields, and the results of plowing under sweet clover in comparison with corn and fallow on wheat, oats, barley, flax, and corn.

According to Superintendent A. A. Dowell, community clubs as well as individual families are invited to spend the day at the station. A special program will be arranged for the women. Coffee, cream, and sugar will be furnished all who bring their picnic lunch.

BRING YOUR CREAM EARLY

Modern business and manufacturing methods are carried on with an efficiency our grandfathers would never have dreamed possible. Products are turned out in such volumes and with such speed that the ordinary man can hardly grasp the immensity.

But nevertheless it takes about 5 hours to pasteurize and cool 1200 gallons of cream, and if we don't get started before 3 o'clock we can't get thru before 8 o'clock. Kindly bring your cream early.

Great Revival Meeting Now On In Community Hall

Conducted by Vernon M. Spivey, Evangelist and Singer, of Chicago

VERNON M. SPIVEY
Evangelist and Singer
Chicago

Mr. Spivey has been sent to Holt under the auspices of Churches of Christ for the purpose of conducting this revival meeting. He is nationally known both as an evangelist and as a singer, having conducted evangelistic meetings in many different states throughout the country. For a number of years he has been the minister and singer for the Central Church of Christ in Chicago. For the past few years his services have become more and more in demand; therefore, he is unable to accept all the calls that come for him.

His Education

While yet a young man, Mr. Spivey is quite an educator, having spent nine years, since he became a man, in different schools of the country. He has taken a great amount of his university work at the University of Illinois and at the Universty of Chicago. Much of his work at the University of Illinois was in the College of Agriculture, he being interested in agricultural work in connection with his work as an evangelist and as a singer. He, therefore, is interested in three distinct fields of service. Mr. Spivey is a lover of country life which accounts for his interest in agriculture. He is not a married man. He says, "When I can find a young lady whom I can love as much as I love farm life, I will get married if it suits her."

His Work as an Evangelist

Mr. Spivey does not claim to be a preacher; although he is recognized as a very fluent speaker, who can hold an audience spell-bound while preaching the Gospel. He had four years Bible training at David Lipscomb College, Nashville, Tennesse, under outstanding Bible scholars But, in addition to this training, from childhood he has been an earnest student of the bible. In religioul matter he recognizes the importance of giving a "thus Saith the Lord" for everything that is taught in the name of religion. He gives book, chapter and verse for everything religiously, and encourages his hearers to take pen and paper and check all sciptual reference given to verify his statement. He is fully aware of the fact the "Gospel is the power of God unto Salvation." (Rom. 1:16)

His Work as a Singer

Mr. Spivey is among the very best singing evangelists in the country, having studied music throughout his educational career. He takes his place, therefore, as a Gospel singer in the religious world. In addition to having directed congregational singing in many large churches in different states, he is known as a radio singer, having had charge of the "Gospel Singers" who sang over station W.J.J.D. of Chicago. He has taught church music also. Upon his arrival in Chicago in September, he is scheduled to have a number of Gospel Hymns recorded on phonograph records. People of Holt who have phonographs will be interested in securing some of those records, and may do so by speaking to Mr. Spivey in person.

The public is invited to attend these services each evening at 8.30 and on Sundays at eleven o'clock a. m. and at 8 p. m. This meeting will last until July 30. A hearty welcome awaits you.

More People Move In

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Johnson of Gatzke moved here last week. They have purchased the Guy Anderson farm east of town which until recently was occupied by G. Michaelson and his family.

The News joins the people of Holt in bidding them welcome to our community.

Several members of the local Ladies Club motored to Crookston yesterday to be the guests of Mrs. P. L. Anderson who entertained the club at her home.

Mrs. Oscar Moline and children of Crookston spent the week here visiting with relatives.

Hans Wahlin and family spent the week end at Evansville on a fishing trip.

Bently Nelson and family of Grand Forks spent the week end here visiting with relatives.

Fred Lorentson and family of Thief River Falls visited at the Sam Lorentson home on Monday evening.

Dorcas Society

The Dorcas Society will meet tomorrow (Saturday, July 18th) at the Oliver Nohre home.

Taken Ill

Tina Hoffman who has been making her home with her brother, John Hoffman, was taken sick last week and upon being examined by the county doctor at Warren, where she was taken on Tuesday by Deputy Sheriff Marshall Kays, it was found that she was mentally deranged.

She was taken at once to the State Hospital at Fergus Falls. Mrs. Fred Peterson and C. O. Saastad from here accompanied the sheriff to that city with the inmate.

Swedes Picnic

The American Sons and Daughters of Sweden will stage their annual midsummer picnic at the Tourist Park in Thief River Falls next Sunday July 19th. According to word received from Fred D. Lorentson, Sec'y-Treas. of the organization, a varied program will be given, consisting of speaking, singing and music.

Bring your lunch and receive coffee, sugar and cream free at the grounds.

Luther Leaguers Plan Bible Camp

The members of Luther Leagues in Northern Minnesota District will conduct a Bible Camp July 20th to 26th at Balsam Beach on the northwest shore of beautiful Tulaby Lake, which is located eighteen miles east of Waubun, Minn, in the heart of the White Earth Indian Reservation.

Nature Study hikes will be conducted by Prof. A. M. Satre of Concordia College, Moorhead, Minn. Fishing, swimming and other recreation under competent and trustworthy supervisors. Rev R. O. Evans of International Falls is in charge of this part of the schedule.

An instructive program has been arranged for the morning hours with the following speakers in charge: Rev. F. A. Schiotz, Duluth; Rev. S. L. Tallakson, Fergus Falls; Mr. Joseph G. Norby, Minneapolis, Manager of Fairview Hospital and superintendent of Bethlehem Lutheran Sunday School; Rev. F. B. Anderson, Minneapolis, Field Secretary and Institute Director of the International Luther League; Rev. A. E. Hanson, Bemidji, President of the Northern Minnesota District Luther League; Prof. A. M. Satre, Moorhead, Dean of the Department of Biology, Concordia College; and Rev. R. O. Evans, International Falls.

Vesper Services each evening will open with a "hymn sing" and will feature the general theme: "Night scenes from the Bible."

The courses offered consist of a connected series of six lectures

Rev. H. S. Strand of Detroit is in charge of registrations.

KARD AV TAK

En kjertelig tak til alle for den eders bevist i kjarelighed i mod os paa vaar 50 aars Brylops Fest.

Tak for Guld gaven.
Torger og Torbor Ness.

The above is a card of thanks from Mr. and Mrs. Ness to all their friends for the reception given them in honor of their fiftieth wedding anniversary and for the beautiful gold gift.

COUPLE CELEBRATE GOLDEN WEDDING

A crowd of over two hundred people gathered at the Free Mission church here Tuesday evening and surprised Mr. and Mrs. Torger Ness on their fiftieth wedding anniversary. A good program had been arranged for the occasion, and a set of gold knives and forks was presented to the honored guests by their many friends and relatives. After the program, a sumptuous lunch was served.

Mr. and Mrs. Ness, who are pioneers in this district, were married July 1st, 1881, in Ness, Nisseral, Telemarken, Norway; emigrated to this country in the spring of 1902, and settled in Yellow Medicine county, Minnesota, where they resided until the fall of that year, when Mr. Ness purchased a team and moved his wife and family to Holt. They had bought a farm southwest of town, where they have lived all these years until recently, when they retired from farming and moved to town. They now own a nice home on the ridge, where they now live.

All their children, except John, the eldest, who could not come, attended the anniversary celebration. They are: Hans, Ralph, Olaf and Theodore, who live in Holt and vicinity; Andrea (Mrs. Gust Williams), who lives in Greenbush, and Anna (Mrs. Oscar Moline), whose home is at Crookston.

Mr. Ness is now 77 years old, and Mrs. Ness, 71. They have always taken part in church and social affairs, and even yet are active in these lines.

The News joins their many friends in extending congratulations, and wishes them many more happy years.

Visiting Relatives

Mrs. C. F. Birkeland and four children of Seattle, Wash., arrived here recently to spend a few weeks visiting friends and relatives. Mrs. Birkeland is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. O. B. Johnson. Mr. Birkeland is employed in an aeroplane factory and could not come to visit.

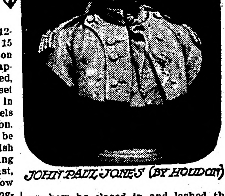
John Paul Jones

JONES' BIRTHPLACE IN KIRKBEAN, SCOTLAND

JOHN PAUL JONES' MEMORIAL IN WASHINGTON, D.C.



JOHN PAUL JONES (BY HOUDON)

By ELMO SCOTT WATSON

ON THE sixth of July, 184 years ago, there was born in Kirkbean, County of Kirkcudbright, Scotland, to a gardener named John Paul, a son who was destined to play a role in the founding of a new nation. For the first twelve years of his life young John Paul, for he was named after his father, lived the life of any boy of his time and there was nothing to indicate the high destiny that awaited him. Then in 1759 he was apprenticed to a Whitehaven merchant, engaged in the American trade, and went to sea. And it was on the sea that this Scotch lad was to win his fame, was to become the outstanding American naval officer of the Revolution and one of our great sea captains of all time.

To most Americans the name John Paul Jones is a familiar one but the extent of their knowledge of him is usually confined to that epic battle between the Bonhomme Richard and the Serapis during which Jones uttered his immortal words, "I have not yet begun to fight." But there is so much more of interest in his career than is given in our school book histories that it deserves wider knowledge among us of his adopted country. For one thing, if for no other, his connection with the early history of our national banner should give him enduring fame. "That Flag and I are twins," he once said. "Born the same day and the same hour. We cannot be parted in life or in death. So long as we can float we shall float together. If we must sink, we shall go down as one."

The Scotch boy who went to sea in 1759 rose rapidly, became a ship owner and by 1773 was making voyages to the West Indies and to India. In the meantime his brother, William Paul, had been adopted by a certain William Jones, and became a prosperous planter. When he died John Paul inherited his estate. Thereupon he added the Jones to his name and settled down as a planter in America which, as he characterized it, was "the country of his fond selection since the age of eighteen."

Jones was not long to carry forward his ambition to become a Virginia gentleman. For the outbreak of the Revolution brought with it the necessity for the rebellious colonies to organize a navy with which to cope if possible with the "Mistress of the Seas," and more especially to waylay ships bringing supplies to the British army. So one of the early acts of the Continental congress was to choose a naval commander-in-chief, four captains and a number of first, second and third lieutenants, and provide ships for them. This new navy was mainly a New England affair and the commander-in-chief was Commodore Esek Hopkins from Massachusetts. The only officers who were not New Englanders were Nicholas Biddle of Pennsylvania and John Paul Jones of Virginia.

Jones' first task was arming and manning the flagship of the fleet of eight vessels given to Commodore Hopkins. It was the Black Prince, a merchant ship, which was renamed the Alfred. In January, 1776, Commodore Hopkins arrived in Philadelphia to go aboard his flagship. As he stepped over the side Captain Saltonstall gave the signal and Lieutenant Jones, who was flag lieutenant, hoisted over the Alfred two flags. The one which he raised to the mizzen peak, as the flag of the United Colonies, was the Grand Union flag of thirteen alternate red and white stripes with the Union Jack in the upper left-hand corner where in the future the field of blue with its white stars was to appear. At the main peak he ran up as the fleet flag one of the famous rattlesnake flags, the first of which had been suggested by Benjamin Franklin.

So came about John Paul Jones' first connection with our national flag.

After his return from this voyage, during which he distinguished himself for boldness and skill when the commander-in-chief displayed a timidity and lack of skill not in keeping with his high position, Jones was given command of the Providence, a 12-gun brig. With her he captured 15 prizes along the Atlantic coast and on October 10, 1776, he was made captain and given command of the Alfred, a 24-gun vessel. On this ship he set out on his cruise which resulted in the capture of seven British vessels which he brought into port at Boston. Convinced that more good could be accomplished by harassing the British in their own waters than by attacking their shipping off the American coast, he began urging congress to allow him to carry the war against England across the Atlantic. Accordingly on June 14, 1777, congress appointed him to the command of the Ranger, a new ship of 18 guns, recently completed at Portsmouth, New Hampshire. In the very same hour that the resolution, giving him command of the Ranger, was passed there was also passed the historic resolution which brought into being the Stars and Stripes. And it was this circumstance which inspired Jones' statement that he and the flag were twins.

And it is here that the stories of John Paul Jones and our national emblem began to run in parallel channels, a story which is little known to most Americans and which has been brought out by a new book, "The National Flag," by Willis Fletcher Johnson, published recently by the Houghton Mifflin company. Upon taking command of the Ranger Jones immediately began preparing the ship for the trip across the Atlantic. Although there is no record of the date when he raised the Stars and Stripes over her, tradition says that it was on the Fourth of July.

Of Jones' cruise of 28 days in British water with the Ranger it has been said, "For daring and success it was unsurpassed in the annals of naval history." In addition to capturing the Drake, he burned the shipping in Whitehaven and off Carrickfergus and made his name one of terror along the coasts of Great Britain.

But the months which followed Jones' success in the Ranger were months of anxiety for him also. Most of his troubles, however, were ashore rather than afloat. He was finding it very difficult to pay his men, sell his prizes and secure a squadron for another and greater cruise which he had in mind. At last an old East India merchant ship was secured, renamed the Bonhomme Richard, in compliment to Benamin Franklin, and to this was joined the Alliance, a 32-gun frigate and three small French vessels. The commander of the Alliance was Capt. Pierre Dandais, who, as Jones wrote to Franklin, was "apperently a crazy man."

If, as Jones had complained that the Ranger was a poor fighting ship because it was "cranky, slow and of trifling force," he soon found that the Bonhomme Richard was worse. Her hull was rotten and later in his great battle with the Serapis one of the heaviest guns blew up at the start forcing a whole battery to be abandoned. The crew was a mixture of Americans and Europeans and with the untrustworthy support of the "crazy" Dandais, his venture was a perilous one at best. But disregarding his many handicaps, Jones sailed from France on August 14, 1779. By September 22, he had nearly completed the circuit of the British isles, had captured 17 vessels and thrown the entire coast into a state of perpetual alarm. What Jones could expect if he were defeated and captured was shown by the British authorities proclaiming him as "the pirate Jones, a rebel subject and criminal of the state."

On September 23 off Flamborough Head, Jones met the "Baltic trade," a convoy of 41 vessels, escorted by the Serapis and the Countess of Scarborough. Then followed the historic engagement of which it has been said "the annals of the American navy contain no finer example of skill, courage and leadership than that found in the duel off Flamborough Head. Rarely has a commander who won his fight contended with such overwhelming obstacles." The story of that engagement is too familiar to need retelling here—how Jones soon realized that the Serapis would destroy him in a long range battle, how he out-maneuvered Pearson, the British commander, how he closed in and lashed the Richard to the Serapis, how the Alliance came to his aid, how the "crazy" Dandais sent a broadside into the unprotected side of Jones' ship and how, in the midst of the shambles around him with the Richard sinking under him, Jones could still hurl back his defiant "I have not yet begun to fight."

So he won his battle and the Briton struck his colors. As for Jones' colors, the Stars and Stripes, they played a glorious part in the battle. For the new flag was flying at the masthead of the Richard when it closed with the Serapis. Once it was shot down, but it was immediately rescued and raised again, and there it stayed to the end, for the Bonhomme Richard was so shattered in the fight that there was no hope of saving it. So Jones transferred himself and his men to the captured Serapis. As a matter of pride and sentiment he would not allow the flag of the Richard to be lowered, but left it flying as the vessel sank with the bodies of her dead.

Jones next sailed into the Texel in Holland, with the Serapis, the Countess and his prizes. But on December 22 Holland asked him to leave. Outside a British blockading fleet was awaiting him, but in broad daylight he took the Alliance boldly out of port, outran the British vessels, sailed down the English channel and arrived safely in France. It was to be another 150 years before an American was to receive as wild a welcome in France as did Jones. And that was when the "Lone Eagle" completed his successful flight across the Atlantic. The king of France gave Jones a gold sword and made him a chevalier of France.

Jones did not return to receive the acclaim of his own countrymen until early in 1781. He reached Philadelphia February 18 of that year, where congress gave him a vote of thanks and the command of the America, a new 74-gun ship then nearing completion. But the Revolution ended before he could again put to sea. With no more fighting to be done Jones could not content himself to go back to Virginia or to settle down to the quiet of commerce on the seas. His restless spirit led him to seek naval service with Russia.

He became a rear-admiral and in 1788 continued his brilliant exploits on the water by defeating the Turkish navy at the battle of Liman. He returned to Russia to reap his reward but he did not stay long. He returned to Paris and there he died July 18, 1792.

What followed is a striking illustration of the old saying about how "a republic forgets." For more than a hundred years the republic which he had helped establish forgot John Paul Jones, at least so far as paying any honor to his ashes was concerned. In 1905 Ambassador Horace Porter, after a long search, found Jones' grave in the old St. Louis cemetery for foreign Protestants. Under instructions from President Roosevelt his remains were exhumed and brought to the United States by an American naval squadron sent especially for that purpose. They were taken to the United States naval academy and then as a final ironical touch to the way in which "the richest and stingiest government in the world" rewards its heroes (for neither his salary, the money he had advanced to the United States government, nor his prize money was paid until a generation after his death) the casket containing his body was left behind a staircase resting on a couple of rough carpenter-horses in one of the buildings at Annapolis for seven years! Then, when the scandal of this threatened to be aired in congress, he was buried with the honors due him.

Navy to Excel In Air Combat

United States Can Launch More Planes Than Any Other World Power.

Washington.—The United States navy now is in a position to place more planes in sea combat than any other world naval power.

From the decks of three great aircraft carriers, and from the catapults of cruisers and batteships, hundreds of fighting, scouting, bombing, and torpedo planes can take off for an aerial offensive so powerful that navy experts hesitate to prophesy the effect of a concentrated attack.

This development of navy aircraft strength comes as the result of a carefully planed and well executed five-year building program inaugurated in 1926 and reaching its climax at the end of the present fiscal year.

Cost $63,000,000.

The program has been effected at a cost of approximately $63,000,000, nearly $25,000,000 less than the original estimates approved by congress. In the brief space of five years the navy has raised the effective force of its aircraft by over 200 per cent and has increased the number of its planes from 350 to over 1,000.

However, the completion of the program will find no letup in navy aeronautical activities.

Navy officials are hopeful of securing additional appropriations from future congresses for at least 500 more planes and four new aircraft carriers.

In recent public anouncements, Assistant Secretary Ingalls has stated the aircraft carrier is the most efficient and powerful weapon of offense and defense yet developed by the navy.

Admiral Moffett in a recent speech declared that "surface vessels that put themselves within range of aircraft will assuredly be obliterated unless adequately protected by aircraft."

Authoritatively representing the views of a large section of naval experts, Admiral Moffett later declared that "our navy should have the maximum possible number of aircraft on its ships. Aircraft had a comparatively minor role in the last war, but it will profoundly change the methods of all future wars to an infinitely greater degree than we can vision today."

Gas Bag Expansion.

Naval officials also are wholeheartedly in favor of rapid expansion in lighter-than-air craft. They point out that with the virtual monopoly of helium, nonexplosive lifting gas, this country is in a position to seize dominance in the military dirigible field.

The favorable showing of the veteran dirigible Los Angeles in the recent war game off Panama greatly heartened navy officers who were losing faith in the military value of the airship.

An integral part of the five-year building program is the construction of two additional dirigibles. One of these, the Akron, is rapidly nearing completion, and is expected to be ready for trial flights in July. The second, designated as the ZRS-5, will be assembled by the Goodyear-Zeppelin corporation as soon as the Akron has been formally accepted by the navy.

The Akron and its sister ship will be equipped as the most powerful fighting aircraft the world has ever seen. They will be in a position for combat as well as scouting and observation work, carrying powerful batteries of supermachine guns and five fighting aircraft.

Honor Paid Designer of Confederate Flag

Montgomery, Ala.—Gov. B. M. Miller has accepted for the state a marble tablet, designating Nicola Marchall, Marion, Ala., as the designer of the first Confederate flag.

The tablet was presented to the state by the women of the Alabama division of the United Daughters of the Confederacy.

Jean Hopkins, Montgomery, a great-granddaughter of Mrs. Napoleon Lockett, Marion, who suggested the design of stars and bars to Marchall, unveiled the memorial.

The flag was raised first on the capitol here March 4, 1861, following its adoption by the Confederate congress.

Seize Four as German Spies on French Border

Strasbourg.—The French police have arrested three German spies, claiming that the culprits were caught in the act of obtaining plans of the new French fortifications along the frontier.

The arrested Germans, the French police allege, have confessed that they have in the past successfully carried to Stuttgart a number of such reports. The French police are now searching for a score of the accomplices of the men already under arrest.

Stowaway Hides 9 Days Without Food or Drink

San Francisco.—For nine days and nights a sixteen-year-old South Sea island native boy lay without food and water in a canvas-covered lifeboat, a stowaway aboard the liner Makura, bound from Papeete to San Francisco.

The boat docked. Deckhands began inspection of the lifeboats. When they lifted the cover which concealed him, the stowaway was too weak to escape, too exhausted even to give his name. Much of the time he had been in the boat a blistering tropic sun had beaten down on his canvas sealed, cramped quarters.

He was removed from the ship on a stretcher and taken to Angel Island immigration depot. He was sent back to Papeete when the Makura made its return trip.

MOST PROSPEROUS NATION IS FRANCE, FIGURES SHOW

Dr. Julius Klein Assembles Data Revealing Remarkable Progress in Past Few Years.

New York.—France is today the most prosperous nation in the world, according to figures assembled by Dr. Julius Klein, assistant secretary of commerce.

"In a world harassed by depression and economic anxiety, France's well-being is conspicuously impressive," Doctor Klein writes in Collier's Weekly. "Measured by almost every index, she has stood forth in the past few years as the most prosperous of nations.

"Until recently her unemployment has been practically nil, whereas the jobless armies in America, England, Germany and Italy, totaled this winter at their peak some 14,000,000 or more. Her per-capita gold holdings at this writing are about $67, as against $42 for Switzerland, $39 for Argentina, $34 for the United States, with England, Germany and Italy straggling far behind. In iron and steel exports, that great staple indicator of power in world trade, she has in the past five years stood at the head of the exporting nations.

"In telegraph wire mileage, her people are now better equipped than any in Europe, with a per-capita average nearly three times that of Germany or Italy and 70 per cent greater than that of England. Her roads in proportion to population are likewise far and away the most adequate on the globe; her improved road mileage per 10,000 of population is 99, whereas that of the United States is 51, England 39, Germany 34 and Italy 28."

Hers is the second greatest colonial empire on the globe and it is worth noting that practically all of it has been acquired since her debacle in 1871. The vital significance of that empire as an element in her present-day economic pre-eminence is all too frequently overlooked; indeed, her colonial commerce is the most important single factor in her external trade, outranking that of any other geographic entity both as a market and as a source of supply for the mother country.

A Candle in the Wilderness

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon leave England in 1634 for the New world. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear. Heydon is apprehended and, refusing to talk, is found guilty. Heathers and Todkill head for New Amsterdam and suspicion begins to point to the former. Belief grows that Heydon is shielding his friend. Elizabeth and her parents sail for England.

If there had been any doubt of that it passed when he addressed the court in behalf of the prisoner. His was the first of many new voices that were to be long and lovingly remembered on that coast of the New world. It was a curious thing to see this youth —not twenty-four years of age—stand, rebuking those grave learned and venerable men before him, any one of whom was old enough to be his father, with a tongue which spoke for the silence of the martyrs and the vision of a prophet. A great spirit speaks always with a rhythm of its own, with a noble dignity and courtesy. So he spoke and so he won his hearers. He surprised them, also, seeing far beyond their position in the little traveled and somewhat lonely path of liberty and human progress.

He reminded them of the danger of haste in reaching a verdict, lest the law suffer more from the magistrates than it had suffered from the accused. They pretended to be and ought to be the administrators of the will of God, and as such the eyes not of New England only but of all the world were fixed upon them. The great need of mankind was a new example of passionless and scrupulous regard for the rights of a prisoner. They and their fathers had suffered from hasty judgments inspired by bitter feeling and imperfect knowledge. These judgments had come of men pretending, also, to administer the will of God, men who could find in his great heart, it would appear, only a cruel sternness and severity. Nothing could be surer than the knowledge that these men had misjudged the will of God. Was there one in the hearing of his voice whose kin had burned at the stake or had had their ears cut off and their noses slit who could entertain the slightest doubt that men do a gross injustice to their Creator when they forget his abundant mercy, his kindness and the slowness of his wrath? However it was not mercy that he was seeking then but justice and that calmness of judgment without which no righteous verdict was possible.

He was proud to tell them that the prisoner had been his friend, now made dearer by his failure to plead which had so aggravated the court. He reminded them that there was nothing more sacred in the view of a well-bred gentleman than friendship. If William Heydon could not plead without incriminating a friend, was it not easy to understand why he had failed to plead? There was a thing dearer than life to some men. It was the sanctity of friendship—a view approved by the Savior of the world.

Undoubtedly the crime was committed by William Heydon or Robert Heathers. William, knowing that Todkill had gone away, set out for his camp that night to appoint a new master for his men. He wandered from his path in the darkness and finding himself lost lay down and slept where he was discovered next day. Meanwhile Robert with all possible speed had put himself safely outside the jurisdiction of the court. It might even be that he had taken ship and was then far out at sea on his way to some foreign port. From such conduct only one conclusion was possible.

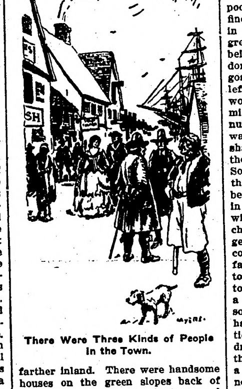
He presented a document signed by Mabel Hartley, then ill in bed, and duly attested. Therein she declared that she had not seen her paramour and that after deliberate thought of the matter she had decided that she might have been in error in identifying William as the guilty man. He called Mr. Grout, the constable, to the witness chair and examined him before the court. To the surprise of all, the constable admitted that in the dim light of the lantern he might have mistaken one lad for the other. He called to the chair Margaret Hooper, the housekeeper of the young men, by whom he proved that they often wore the same coat. Sir Harry said in conclusion:

"In view of the good character of this young man, in view of these centainties and uncertainties, you cannot convict William Heydon and be just to your own consciences and to the colony you serve. I ask therefore that judgment be suspended until further and more decisive evidence has been secured."

The plea was granted. These stern men were more open to persuasion than Roswell Brade. For fear of exciting opposition Sir Harry had been modest in his demand, believing that when his yeast had had an opportunity to work in the public mind all that he could ask for would be accomplished.

The speech was presently in many mouths. It was the theme of every fireside in the peninsula, and the deputies carried it to remote towns. A strong reaction in favor of the prisoner set in. Let us now survey the scene of this spreading ferment.

Boston was a comely, growing town spreading backward from a deep cove between two long arms of the promontory. Its largest structure, well wharfed out to deep water, was at the point of the cove. It was the receiving and shipping center of the town. Beyond the shipping house were two towering hills on whose summits were beacons, lighted at night, and "loud babbling guns." A third hill stood farther inland. There were handsome houses on the green slopes back of the cove, some built of stone and roofed with slate, some of brick and of wood. They stood on cleanly, well-kept streets called lanes and roads. There were Green lane, Prison lane, Parson lane, Church lane, Hill road and others. In summer their dooryards were grassed and adorned with flowers. The meeting house on a terrace of the hillside was built of planks and roofed with them. It was the tallest structure in Boston. Its gallery and main room could accommodate seven hundred people. It was filled with the odor of resinous pine. On the main street directly back of the shipping house in the midst of the town were the stores and shops of brick and wood and stone. Plank sidewalks had been laid in deference to the women, mud having been the cause of great domestic infelicity. On these walks in fair weather were silent Indians in paint and feathers, somber-clad, sober-faced churchmen, goodmen going to and from their work in sherryvallies, slattern fishwives, young ladies in filmy silks and dainty slippers, brawny, rough-clad sailor men with weathered skins, and gentlemen as well dressed and educated as any to be met in London. The magistrates and the ministers were complaining that it was an evil, backsliding generation given over to sinful extravagance.



There Were Three Kinds of People in the Town.

There were three kinds of people in the town—gentlemen, among whom were many learned graduates of English universities, goodmen and hand-to-mouth toilers who lived in huts and cabins with the sea-folk along the shores. Certain of the gentlemen's families sat with their white help at table in the center of which was the saltcellar, the servants sitting below the salt. Only a few women of high birth could read or write.

The female part of the population was mostly ignorant and high tempered. They were also cruel to the indentured slaves who served in their houses. There were some who beat them severely, and a servant in bad standing was compelled to kneel when he came into the presence of his mistress.

There were numbers of women of the type of Margaret Winthrop who had the fine manners and graceful talk of the best in England but a narrow learning confined to reading, writing, the simplest processes of arithmetic and the knowledge derived from her study of sacred history. A book was a rare and a highly prized possession. Counting the Bibles there were probably not a thousand books in Boston. On Margaret's reading table were the Bible, a "Plea for Infants," a "Garland of Virtuous Dames," "The Psalme Book," "The Ruine of Rome," a "Troubler of the Chirch of Amsterdam," Humphrey Baker's "Well Spring of Sciences," "The Foundation of Christian Religion Gathered Into Sixe Principles." Such an opulence of supply excited the envy of her friends.

Most of these well-born ladies were discontented with the loneliness, the poor fare, the stern climate, the confined and dreary monotony of life in this little town on the edge of a great wilderness. They longed, albeit secretly, for the pomp and splendor, the beauty, the stir, the color, the gossip and excitement which they had left in the abundant life of the Old world. But behind them was the mighty deep with its terrors, its innumerable delays and torments. It was like the dreaded valley of the shadow of death and they were as those come to a purgatory beyond it. Some begged to be taken back, but their husbands, whose savings had been flung into the great hazard, were in no mood to surrender. So man and wife turned to the consolations of the church. Thus it came about that even gentle-hearted women followed the counsel of the ministers and set their faces sternly against all things likely to defeat their hope of another chance to live and be happy. They had felt a degree of sympathy for the handsome youth accused of adultery who had given them a topic of conversation which had been the solace of dreary winter days. Nearly all of them were secretly against hanging as a penalty for this crime, but they had not dared to oppose the minister and the magistrates until Harry Vane had spoken out in the hearing of certain of their number.

The gossip which follows is in large part from the diary of a lady with a gift of humor, who was one of a knitting party. It is rich with the flavor of that little segment of time.

Peggy Weld had held her peace in all the counsels of the gentlewomen. Now she opened her mind.

"Think of the circumstances," she said. "William had just come from his sweetheart and the two were near their wedding day and he a warm lover. The pretty wench was laying for him like a cat for a mouse on his way home."

"Well, he is a comely lad," said the stout, red-cheeked Mrs. Keayne, wife of the succcessful merchant. "Without the stay of religion what a lot of cats we would be!"

"He fell," Peggy went on. "It was dark and there was that devilish odor of musk. He slipped. Well, you know what the best people would say of that in England. I do not try to excuse his act, still I feel for him. I reckon that Adam was not married, but the Lord did not hang him."

"It is the worst temptation that the devil can put upon one and may God have mercy on us," said an honest old lady in her lace cap. "We all have the corrupt mind which cometh naturally of Adam. The Lord has been good to us. He might have cast us into hell in our own mothers' wombs."

The gossip of the older people was always flavored with piety and the ever present fear of that vengeful tyranny which was above all others.

Nation Christian Only as It Is Understood

The assumption that the United States is a Protestant country is correct only in the sense that the great majority of its inhabitants belong to the Protestant religion. The federal Constitution does not state that the United States is a Protestant nation, or even a Christian nation. Article VI says in part that "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States" and the First amendment says in part that "congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." In a treaty signed with Tripoli, a Mohammedan country, in 1796, Article XI begins "As the government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." However, in a Supreme court decision rendered in 1892, it was declared incidentally by Justice Brewer who rendered the decision, that "This is a Christian nation." This, it should be remembered, was not the point at issue in the suit before the court.—Detroit News.

Holiday Spirit

During frosty weather a baby car got into a dreadful skid, shot across the road, and turned a complete somersault, imprisoning its two passengers. A woman who had witnessed the affair ran to the spot and called out agitatedly: "Is anyone hurt?"

"Oh, no," came a voice from the interior. "This is nothing to us. We are airmen."

Sue and Her Needed Sun Bath

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

SUE stepped into the torrid air of the big greenhouse that nurtured the tropical plants of the park, with the air of one who performs an act that could be held as suspicious. In other words, Sue sneaked in.

She found a spot where the sun beat mercilessly down from its great blue dome of mid-July, and sat down on her small camp stool. She then fumbled in a bag for a tidy package of sandwiches and a sketch book and pencil. She managed the lunch quite naturally but the sketch book and pencil seemed unfamiliar tools in her slender hands.

In removing her blue and gold hat, Sue released a mass of curls that a baby might envy, so soft and silky they were.

Sue began idly sketching a tropical tree. She selected it because there were clumps of fruit hanging about and very large leaves. It looked fairly easy to draw.

The only other occupant of the grilling hothouse was a young man who had crept into the coolest fern corner he could find and was mopping his brow and longing for the refreshing sensation of an iced shower bath. He was sketching, however, some details of tropical plants with the fineness and the gifted touch of an artist.

Sue had crept in so quietly that Pen, as he was called in artistic circles, did not know of her arrival. It was a disagreeable, hacking little cough, reaching his ears from time to time that told him that another soul was sharing his enforced roasting in the tropical plant house.

Then he peered from among the ferns and saw what he supposed to be a child of fifteen or so. Sue didn't look a day older. Sue was, however, twenty-one.

Had Pen realized that Sue had reached that advanced age, he would not have approached her so carelessly to have a chat.

Sue looked up with great blue eyes as he stood beside her, and would have hidden her sketch had he permitted it.

"I'd like to see it," said Pen, much as if he were talking to a very young child.

"It's not very good," she said, and handed him the drawing.

Sue had never spoken a truer word. Pen bit his lip in an effort not to smile outright.

"I think you have made the figs a bit too big—"

"They happen to be bananas," explained Sue with dignity and turned her back completely on Pen.

And poor Pen felt keenly the fact that he had hurt the child beyond forgiveness. He cast a hopeless glance at the edge of a pink cheek and slightly heaving shoudlers and patted the same shoulders very gently.

She turned on him and then instead of anger her eyes were full of laughter. The nasty little cough, however, came between smiles.

"I know I don't know the first thing about sketching," she told him shyly, "but in order to get in this sunny hothouse, I had to get a permit to sketch."

"But why sit in this boiling sun, child? Aren't you afraid of sunstroke or heartache or something like that?"

"In the first place," said Sue, "you may as well be put straight as to my age. I am twenty-one."

"What? Great Scott! You look like a child! You must think me frightfully rude."

"Well—I don't think it was exactly polite to take my good bananas for figs." She looked swiftly at her watch. "Oh, I must hurry. I have to be back at the office."

"Are you coming again?" he questioned swiftly.

"I have to come every noon hour," said Sue. "The doctor told me I must get away into the sunshine and bake this cough out of my system. But since that is quite impossible, I am doing the best I can." She looked so wistfully up at Pen, that, big man though he was, he positively quaked in his boots. He had a most awful desire to pick Sue up bodily and carry her off to the sunshine of California and to health. However, if she intended coming each noon hour there would be time to work up gradually to this pirate business.

"It's a fine idea, sunning yourself here," Pen told Sue. "I must be here, too, to get details for a big frieze I'm working on for Mrs. Goldchunk's dining room. I suppose," he looked straight into Sue's blue eyes, "I—hope you won't mind my speaking to you tomorrow?"

Sue looked up at Pen's nice honest eyes and smiled.

"I think my art really does need some helpful criticism," she admitted an Pen knew that the hottest hothouse in the world was going to be a place of refreshing loveliness when Sue was in it.

Old Shipyard Passes

One of the oldest shipyards in Europe, the Cantiere Navale Odero della Foce in Genoa, Italy, is soon to be scrapped. It was established in 1467 and in it were built the famous war galleys which were used by the republic against the Turkish corsairs. When Italy was overrun by the French a number of fighting ships were constructed here for Napoleon. Genoa has grown around the shipyard, which is now in the center of an industrial district. New houses will be erected on the site.

Relics of Stone Age in Old Orkney Village

Evidence that our ancestors of the Stone age really slept in stone beds has been obtained by Prof. V. Gordon Childe of the University of Edinburgh in his excavations at Skara Brae, a ruined village in the Orkney islands, off Scotland.

In a report to the British journal, Antiquity, Professor Childe describes the furniture of a bed-sitting room, marvelously preserved, in one of the stone huts at Skara Brae.

The beds, which stand against the wall of the stone hut, are oblong boxlike inclosures with stone slabs for sides, held in place by stone wedges driven into the floor. The slabs at the head and foot are taller, like bedposts, and perhaps were designed to support a canopy of skins, Professor Childe suggests. For a mattress the sleeper probably had ferns or heather.

Eating in bed seems to have been an old custom, judging by the gnawed bones found in the floors of the beds. Beads and other valuables also were found in them, showing that the mattress of a bed was a hiding place for treasures then, as today.

"Members of the family used to sit by day on the edge of the bed's front partition slab, which is often noticeably worn save at the ends where the 'bedposts' protected it," Professor Childe stated. "Articles they were making or using are frequently to be met on the floor between this improvised seat and the fire."

The age of Skara Brae is not yet determined, but Professor Childe considered that it was a belated Stone age settlement, which existed in the British Bronze age and which has been remarkably preserved through very unusual circumstances.—Kansas City Star's Science Service.

Record Established by Elderly English Pair

In celebration of their silver wedding anniversary, Rev. John Pyddoke, rector of Pleasley, England, and his wife set up a new aviation record by qualifying for pilot's licenses on the same day. He is sixty-one and she is fifty-two. They took their test at Tollerton airdrome. One of the tests was to take the machine 2,000 feet up, shut off the engine, and land within 150 yards of a given spot. The rector went up first and landed on the exact spot. Mrs. Pyddoke passed her tests with similar ease. Mrs. Pyddoke had her first lesson in flying nearly two years ago. She was so thrilled that on returning home she persuaded her husband to take a flight. It happened to be a "bumpy" day in the air and the rector was not impressed, but further experience converted him.

"I started reading three of my stories to stars," he writes, "and they would not let me finish them, but demanded my terms halfway through. I suppose that is flattering."

One of his stories deserves dissemination.

Husband (calmly)—Oh, I shall be back before then.—Lustige Kolner Zeitung, Cologne.

Act Your Age!

You've seen young men with old faces, and old men with young faces. The men in the latter class have learned the secret of youth.

They know that "pep" and interest in life come from perfect health.

Many old men with young faces have told us that Fellows' Syrup is their standby. They take it regularly. They wouldn't be without it.

Go to your druggist's today. Get a bottle of this valuable tonic. Take it three times daily, and watch your "pep" return.

Men Also Called "Gossips"

After traveling extensively in the British Isles, where he observed the conversations of men and women, Justice Alfred H. Coulter returned to Belfast, Ireland, recently, and declared that he had learned that men are as great gossips as women. In a lecture he said that it was a mistake to think that only women gossiped, for he had found men who could "talk the heads off women."

Automatic Tire Pump

A tire pump built into bicycle wheels, that works automatically when the pressure falls below the full inflation point, is a recent German invention. A cam mounted on the hub operates the plunger of the pump, which is held down by a latch when the pressure is high enough, but released when the tire begins to go soft.

Grade Streets

The Village Council hired a big caterpillar tractor and grader from H. P. Lund & Sons on Friday and had them do some work on our streets. They graded up the main street to a high center so it will shed the water without washing out small holes and leaving puddles as it did before after heavy rains.

The also cut off the shoulders and graded up the centers on a few of the side streets which will make them stand up better in wet weather and which improved the looks of the town.

We think that it would be a good idea if a little local work was done in the line of graveling the side streets. This work can be done all of us going out for the gravel and put it on for our own benefiit. How about it?

Bill Davis Flops Car

While out driving with two local boy friends on Friday night Wm. Davis had the misfortune to turn over in the ditch with his father's chevrolet sedan. The damages to the car were: a few badly bent fenders, broken windshield and a few dent in the car body.

None of the boys were hurt as the car was going slow when it turned upside down.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson, Hjalmer Johnson and Lars Chenill made a business trip to the county seat on Tuesday.

4-H Club Held Meeting

The 4-H Club held their meeting at the J. P. Augustine home on Wednesday evening, July 15, with an attendance of 42. A program was given, including a very interesting talk by Chester Larson, on his trip to the Junior Short Course at St. Paul. The members decided to send for a club banner, also some official caps to be used on achievement day. After the meeting, games were played on the lawn, and a light lunch was served by Mrs. Augustine. The club tour will be held the second of August, starting at Holt, and they plan on reaching Sagstuen's place by noon, after which the club kittenball team will play with picked up team.

Achievement Day will be held at Holt some time in August. Watch this paper for further details.

Officers Re-elected in School Election

The annual school election held at the schoolhouse on Tuesday evening was a quiet affair as there was not much opposition for the offices. R. A. Werner, present president of the board and Geo. Fricker, the treasurer were reelected to serve three more years. The annual report was read and explained to the thirty voters who attended meeting.

BRING YOUR CREAM EARLY

Modern business and manufacturing methods are carried on with an efficiency our grandfathers would never have dreamed possible. Products are turned out in such volumes and with such speed that the ordinary man can hardly grasp the immensity.

But nevertheless it takes about 5 hours to pasteurize and cool 1200 gallons of cream, and if we don't get started before 3 o'clock we can't get thru before 8 o'clock. Kindly bring your cream early.

Revival Meeting Grows in Interest

Evangelistic Services in Community Hall, Conducted by Vernon M. Spivey, Evangelist and Singer, Attracts Attention of Town

VERNON M. SPIVEY
Evangelist and Singer
Chicago

Last night marked the close of the first week of this revival meeting. The attendance has steadily increased each evening from the begining. Mr. Spivey has shown himself to be a master of his work, both as a speaker and as a singing director. His hearers are impressed with his sincerity and humility; and with his reliance upon the bible for everything that is taught in the name of religion. He quotes the scripture very fluently, giving biblical references and encourages people to investigate for themselves.

"Seeking the Old Path"

His subject for last evening was "Seeking the Old Path" He used as a text, Jeremiah 6:16. The speaker said, "It is time for the mass of humanity to get back to the old path. We are, as a nation, drifting hellward. Just as God, thru his great prophet, pleaded with the ancient Israelites to get back to the old path, so is He pleading with proud America today to get back to the old path which is God's way. The speaker further said; "The world is asking what is Christianity". The world doesn't know. It is confused because of somany religious divisions. One of the greatest cures in the world today is that of denominationalism. Hones people are often times deceived and mislead simply because of the creeds opinions of man. They say, well how are we to know who is right? Here is one religious body teaching one thing and over here is another one teaching something else; and so it goes thruout approximately two hundred religious bodies in America. Ladies and Gentlemen there is only one safe course and that is to get back to the Bible.

The Singing

Mr. Spivey is placing special stress upon the congregational song services. He encourages everybody to join in the singing. Old hymns and gospel songs are used, that are known thruout the religious world. About thirty minutes are devoted to singing each evening, and this is proving to be of special interest to the public. Being well versed in Hymnology, Mr. Spivey relates the history behind many of the greater gospel songs. This causes the audience to appreciate them more and more. People are encouraged to get into the spirit of the song services - to "sing with the spirit and with the understanding." He believes in singing the gospel as well as preaching the gospel.

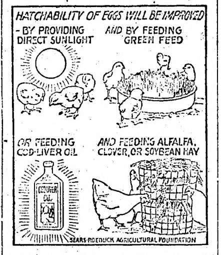
Services continue at the regular hours, namely, 8:30 each evening and at 11 o'clock a. m. on Sundays, until July 30.

Inserted and paid for by Mr. Spivey.

HOW TO PRODUCE HATCHABLE EGGS

Poor hatches make costly chicks and are an important factor in cutting down poultry profits, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation states. Forty out of every hundred eggs incubated each year fail to produce live chicks, according to the United States Department of Agriculture. About half of the loss is due to low fertility and half to weak germs which do not survive the incubation period.

To obtain good hatches the flock must be bred, fed and managed for that purpose. Only strong, healthy birds produce good hatching eggs with strong germs which will develop into vigorous chicks. Some hens lay eggs with a higher degree of hatchability than other hens apparently equally vigorous. This characteristic is hereditary and may be developed in the flock by trap nesting and selection of hens whose eggs produce a high percentage of live chicks.



HATCHABILITY OF EGGS WILL BE IMPROVED
- BY PROVIDING DIRECT SUNLIGHT
AND BY FEEDING GREEN FEED
OR FEEDING COD-LIVER OIL
AND FEEDING ALFALFA, CLOVER, OR SOYBEAN HAY
COD LIVER OIL
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

Tests, particularly at the Ohio Experiment Station, have shown that to produce eggs of high hatchability, the hens must receive two things: First, direct sunshine or its equivalent in cod liver oil; second, green feed, or a substitute in the form of alfalfa, clover or soybean hay. Skimmilk and buttermilk also will partly substitute for green feed.

After the grass season starts, hens may receive both sunshine and green feed direct from the range, but in the late winter and early spring, when most of the eggs used for hatching are produced, they must be furnished by the poultryman. Besides these sources of vitamines, the ration must contain an ample supply of protein, the Foundation adds.

H. Moberg, manager for the local shipping association shipped two carloads of mixed stock to St. Paul last week.

H. T. Larson and family, H. O. Hanson and family, L. J. Horien and family picnicked at Maple Lake Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Johnson of Finley, No. Dak., were visitors in town Friday evening. Mrs. Johnson was formerly Miss Rognlie who taught school here.

Old Gents Have Big Turnover

Two old gentlemen from up near Greenbush took a nasty tumble with their car here on Wednesday afternoon. They were on their way home from Thief River and by mistake they followed the old highway out of town going north. They had not gone very far on this old row of hills when they blew out a tire and started to roll around in circles, headlong leaps and a few looking-at-the-world-from-other-angle-flops, when a big strong telephone pole, saw what a predicament the old gents were in and, stood right in the way of the rolling crazy car and stopped it with a good smack on top of the rear end.

After counting themselves and also finding the driver's pipe, they got the car up on all four and had it hauled to town where Elmer Engstrom administered first aid to the bruised parts.

The car, a new Chev sedan, was not damaged so much considering the stunts it pulled in a few seconds, and can be made new again for about $50. The occupants were not hurt but had a shakedown that they will not so soon forget. They left for their home an hour after the big performance.

Sands to Manage State Farms

Appointment of John W. Sands of Alvarado as Farm Manager for the third district comprising Kittson, Marshall and the 12 western townships of Beltrami county, containing more than 450 farms owned by the Minnesota Rural Credit department, was announced today by C. F. Gaarenstroom, department secretary.

Mr. Sands has been employed as an assistant farm manager for the Rural Credit since Aug. 1, 1930 and has maintained his office at Alvarado. With the new arrangement of the district, the main office of the district will be in Argyle. The third district is the largest district in the state.

The Alvarado man will have two assistants working with him these being A. C. Wolfe of S. Paul and Carl Ronander of Bronson. A branch office may be opened in the eastern part of the county so as to be of more convenience for the territory in the district.—Warren Sheaf.

Shingle Parsonage

A few of the members of the congregation of the Nazareth Lutheran church have shingled the roof on the parsonage this week. It was absolutely necessary to do this work now as the roof was leaking in many places and the Dorcas Society had hired Mr. Finstad of Newfolden to repaint the inside of the house and no one wanted to see that this work should be spoiled by rain.

The work of laying the shingles on the type of roof such as the one on the parsonage required the skill of an experienced man so the Ladies Aid whom are sponsoring this project, hired John Hagberg to put in full time at the job and to supervise the work of those who donated their time in helping with the job.

Some of the members of the congregation and others who were unable to help with the work have promised that they would make a cash donation towards paying for the work and material. Let us all that were not there, help share the burden of this expense by making a cash contribution to the church.

Big Haying Project

What is termed as one of the biggest haying projects in this part of the state is now in full swing out in the Mud Lake bottom. The past two dry seasons have cut down the yield of hay around here and the big stock raisers had to look for new hay land.

We have been told that there are twenty-five different parties out there cutting hay and, several thousand tons will be put up.

Polish Gentleman Is No Apollo, But He Sure Has a Way With Women

Warsaw.—Leo Weidenberg, a tailor by profession and a husband by avocation, is front-page copy for the Warsaw newspapers, and his genius deserves even wider attention. Although he is sixty-one years old and the owner both of a red beard and an ugly face, he has been married eight times and his offspring number 46.

When his eighth wife appeared before a magistrate recently in a plea for a divorce she brought with her five other wives, all undivorced, to aid her cause. But she did not consider that all were women of tender hearts and stanch attachment to her philandering mate. The moment Weidenberg was brought in all the former Mrs. Weidenbergs started a fight for him. During the scramble Weidenberg modestly disappeared and for all anybody knows is marrying again.

Decides to Travel.

Meantime, stories of his escapades lengthen. Forty-three years ago Weidenberg, then a youth of eighteen, resided in Warsaw as a tailor's apprentice, known among his chums as "Red" because of his flaming hair. He married Rebecca Frol and during seven years of wedlock five children were born.

Then he disappeared. All search for him was in vain and his wife and children suffered great need. Weidenberg had decided to travel. He went to Russia and after changing from the Jewish faith to Russian orthodox, he married a girl and begat five children. After eight years of marriage in Russia wanderlust seized him again and he returned to Poland. On a river boat from Warsaw to Plock he fell in love with a Jewish girl named Channa Zebrak. Having his old papers he was married by a rabbi and within four years—four children blessed this union.

Changes Faith Again.

At Lublin he met Mary Nowak. Weidenberg had to change his faith again. He became a Roman Catholic. There followed another marriage, and twins. Two years later he was in Piotrkow and there met Joan Silva, a member of the Marjawit sect of the Catholic church, unrecognized by the pope. Weidenberg became a Marjawit and married Joan. Five children blessed this union.

Weidenberg then went to America. There followed a marriage to Wichna Rozenkrans of New York. Two children were born and he returned hastily to Poland, a deportee. He continued his career through two more marriages but tripped up when he arrived in Warsaw. One of his former wives met him on the street. He was arrested and admitted his guilt. He gave the names of his wives. Six could be summoned. The Russian and American ones have not been called yet. The grand total resulted in eight wives and 46 children. Thirty-nine have been located.

Lips and Eyes Tested as Keys to Character

Oxford, England.—The theory that lips and eyes are a key to vocation and character, suggested by Professor Bettmann, the Heidelberg dermatologist, was tested at a gathering at an Old Students' reunion at Oxford university. Many men distinguished in different walks of life were chosen for the test.

It was found that while there was some link between certain features and character, the theory appeared correct only in the generalized sense, but there was one exception. The legal profession, it was found, had one predominating facial feature—the thin lip.

Professor Bettman maintains that deep thinkers have the thinnest lips.

Mormon Mantle Shelves to Adorn Parish House

Auburn, N. Y.—Two mantle shelves carved by Brigham Young, Mormon leader, will decorate a Presbyterian parish house. The mantle shelves are of marble, neatly chiseled. Brigham Young's boyhood days were spent in Port Byron, in the heart of the Finger lake region of New York.

Madrid.—Bullfighting slang has a new word added to its vocabulary—"monarchy," and its derivatives.

Thus an entirely bad bullfight is a "monarchical" bullfight.

A bullfighter who is no good has gone "monarchial," and the "fan" is entitled to yell at him, "You're worse than the monarchy."

Recently the noted bullfighter, "Gitanillo de Triana," whose real name is Francisco Vega de los Reyes (reyes means kings), appeared in Valencia, but the posters read: "Francisco Vega de la Republica."

Washington.—The Federation Aeranautique Internationale of France, because of certain technical conditions, has not approved the refueling endurance record of Dale Jackson and Forest O'Brien, made last year near St. Louis. College Education Is Valued at $60,000

Seattle.—Is a college education for two persons worth $60,000?

That was the valuation put on an education by attorneys who brought suit for $60,000 against Fiorito Brothers, contractors, owners of a truck which collided with a car and caused the death of Edward Schieck. The attorneys contended that Edna and Fred Schieck, children of the victim, lost their opportunity to get a college education when their father was killed, and should have compensation for being deprived of the schooling. Edna is nineteen and Fred sixteen.

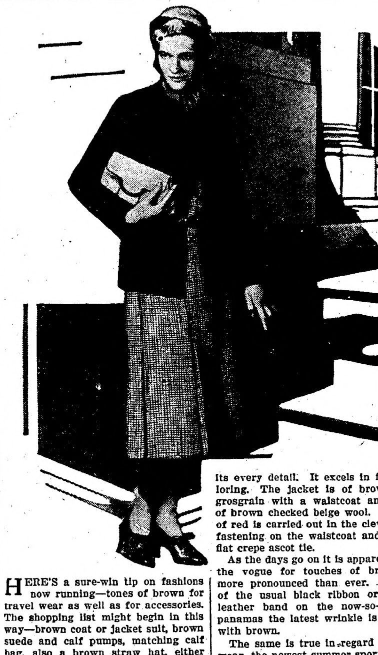
Brown Smart for Town or Travel



HERE'S a sure-win tip on fashions now running—tones of brown for travel wear as well as for accessories. The shopping list might begin in this way—brown coat or jacket suit, brown suede and calf pumps, matching calf bag, also a brown straw hat, either the new rough braid or one of the exotic linenlike straws and gloves, either brown or white.

For afternoons note down a brown-and-white print frock, to which by way of a postscript add a white taffeta silk jacket, also one of brown transparent velvet just for a change. A turban of straw and white pleated silk bespeaks that which is swankiest in millinery if you do not prefer a white panama with a brown velvet or grosgrain band. It goes without saying that gloves with this outfit should be white and long loose-fitting, while shoes may be either white or white with brown.

For travel or about town wear or to serve as a spectator sports costume, the costume illustrated is patrician in its every detail. It excels in fine tailoring. The jacket is of brown silk grosgrain with a waistcoat and skirt of brown checked beige wool. A note of red is carried out in the clever side fastening on the waistcoat and in the flat crepe ascot tie.

As the days go on it is apparent that the vogue for touches of brown is more pronounced than ever. Instead of the usual black ribbon or patent leather band on the now-so-popular panamas the latest wrinkle is trim it with brown.

The same is true in regard to footwear, the newest summer sports shoes are white buck with swatches of brown leather or pipings in brown instead of black.

And have you seen the latest in the "double-date" dresses which are terribly smart and as practical as smart? They are called double-date because in the twinkling of an eye they can be changed from a sports frock to a tailored ensemble. It is simply a matter of donning or doffing the long dark silk coat which complements the white frock under it. A perfectly stunning double-date costume tops a white sleeveless flat crepe dress with a long sort of redingote coat made of eyeleted brown silk.

BLACK AND WHITE REMAINS IN FAVOR

Black and white continues to be a combination greatly in favor wherever smart women dine. The degree of taste and perfection which is used in this combination has a direct bearing on the effect of the costume. The all-white hat, the white glove and chalk-white jewelry has much to do with its success, says a fashion correspondent in the Kansas City Star.

White linen has a crispness which no one can deny, especially when it is combined with a black hat, either of coarse straw with a glazed surface or one of the crocheted straws. No one has ever known the exact percentage of white to advise in combination with black. Fashion is favoring the black satin skirt and the cream lace blouse for informal dining. This may be worn with a white or an egg-shell jacket.

Contrast is the watchword for the linen suit. The white skirt with the navy jacket has by far and away given the brown and white combinations a race for popularity, while red and white, or a cherry red linen skirt and a french blue handkerchief linen surplice blouse are in the height of fashion.

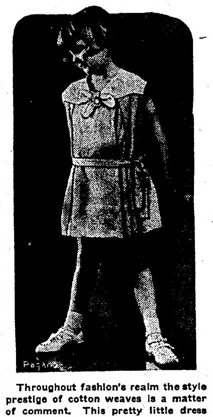
Or listen to this combination which was worn at the horse show in Tuxedo park by New York debutantes: White dresses accompanied by very short white wool capes, and a red and green sash at the belt and with these small white visca caps.

Longer Evening Coats to Return for Winter

The longer evening coats show signs of returning next winter, advises a Paris fashion writer in the New York Times. Lucile Paray favors slightly trailing evening coats, in velvet of the same color as frocks—which just escape the floor. Germaine Lecomte makes three-quarter evening coats of Lyons velvet or velveteen that contrast with the frock. A tiger-colored velveteen coat with a black frock is a striking example. Irene Dana has an attractive floor-length evening coat of pale pink velveteen.

Short jackets are by no means abandoned. Worth and Irene Dana both show white cross-barred velvet jackets barely below waistlength, and Worth's new summer and winter jackets of flat fur with fabric sleeves are among the most attractive evening wraps yet invented. They are cut with a dropped shoulder line and draped in around the waist, stopping just above the hip bones. One is of black broadtail with puffed sleeves of white satin; another of pale gray broadtail with huge sleeves in silver lame.

Cotton Dress Favored for the Six-Year-Old



Throughout fashion's realm the style prestige of cotton weaves is a matter of comment. This pretty little dress is fashioned of maize-color "pineapple mesh" durene (perfectly mercerized) cotton. Inverted pleats starting at the yoke and a novel white collar are important styling features.

Color Combinations Now Brighten the New Modes

Brown and yellow, green and crimson, gray and sapphire—these are the tints which now brighten a mode devoted to unusual color combinations instead of striking silhouettes.

Brown coats are worn with brick-red or leaf-green frocks, brown hats, gloves and belts. Brown suits are finished with lemon yellow, leaf green, or beige and copper striped blouses and chocolate hued accesories.

The woman whose suit is navy blue may choose white accessories, or a blouse of lemon yellow, while the debutante with a dark blue wool coat may wear a pastel blue or maise yellow frock with hat and shoes of dark blue. Geranium red combined with pearl gray is another favorite combination for navy.

Light green ensembles are worn with dark green chapeaux and accessories, while leaf-green frocks may be worn with black or wood brown coats, hats and bags.

A Candle in the Wilderness

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

THE STORY

Robert Heathers and William Heydon leave England in 1634 for the New world. They are welcomed at Boston by Rev. Doctor Cotton and make acquaintance with Amos Todkill, veteran soldier and woodsman. Heydon falls in love with Elizabeth Brade. The young men settle down to the life of the colonists. Adverse comment forces them to dispense with their pretty cook, Mabel Hartley. Robert is smitten with Peggy Weld, who is engaged to James Rosewell. Mabel Hartley and a youth, whom she says was Heydon, are accused of adultery. Heydon and Heathers disappear. Heydon is apprehended and, refusing to talk, is found guilty. Heathers and Todkill head for New Amsterdam and suspicion begins to point to the former. Belief grows that Heydon is shielding his friend. Elizabeth and her parents sail for England. New evidence seems to point to Heathers as the guilty man.

"I agree with Sir Harry that the Lord is kind and not at all like the kings of this world," said Peggy.

"And I agree with him that Robert and not William is the guilty man," said Margaret Winthrop.

Then Peggy Weld, with much feeling, made a plea for her lover. It was of no avail. They were not to be turned. They answered her with impatient carriage. He had run away. Moreover Robert had a look in his eye and a way with women that gave one dark thoughts. William was different. He might have a measure of the grace of God in him. He was a more serious man. This was the beginning of a remarkable resolution in the strong-hearted girl, Peggy Weld.

"Robert Heathers has been a kind of hitching post for horses," she said. "Every nag in the colony has been gnawing it. I shall make you all apologize. I am going to find Robert Heathers if possible. I shall go with Henry, who is eager to explore the wilderness. With God's help we shall find Robert and bring him back, and I think that we shall put you all to shame."

After that day the women of influence in Boston began to advocate the theories of Sir Harry Vane in relation to this remarkable case.

The so-called goodmen of the town were those who had saved a little money and were just beyond the need of anxious toil. They worshiped the upper classes and humbly followed their leadership. Most of them were able to write their names, to add, subtract and divide and to read the Bible in a stumbling fashion. Their wives were not so well furnished with accomplishments. They were more or less in awe of their great goodmen, but there were moments when the awe was flung off and forgotten.

John Samp was an example of this type of citizen.

Returning from their fruitless errand up the coast to the tavern ship, John Samp and the sailor with him were nearly spent and drowned in the sea. Storm lashed, their shallop broke on a shoal, turned on her beam end and lay with her mast-top under water. Clinging to his chair Mr. Samp got to an island where after three days of intense hunger and discomfort he had been rescued by fishermen. He was a sagging and dejected figure of a man when he returned to Boston five weeks after he had left it. His flesh hung as limp as ungartered hose. He entered his humble domicile with a look which betrayed the feeling that he was weary of life but willing to put up with it for the sake of his wife and the colony.

His wife was sweeping. She scarcely noticed him. She swept with renewed energy on his arrival as if he were a part of the dust and litter. She gave him a withering look and began to scold in a voice heard by the neighbors.

"Don't lie to me, John Samp—don't lie to me," she demanded, before he had spoken. "You've took and rooinged yerself with drink and women. It's writ all over ye. Don't talk to me."

Now Mrs. Samp really desired that he should talk to her with no unnecessary delay. She was burning for information. Her words had been intended only as a mild warning that she was not to be easily deceived.

On such occasions Mr. Samp maintained a profound gravity of deportment.

With a look of injured innocence on his big red face he sank in a chair and said nothing. His wife paused and looked at him and called out:

"Well, have ye nothing to say?"

In a loud voice he began: "I've been swallered and puked up by the sea. I'm rooinged. I've been shipwrecked and cast on a lonely island. I've purished o' cold and hunger. I've ketched the rheumatiz. Go and get the ax and put me out o' my misery, Mrs. Samp."

Mr. Samp did not tell her, as he later told others, that he had seen a mereman of great size rise out of the sea and tip the shallop with his hands. She was already "too skeered o' water."

Invited to be his executioner, Mrs. Samp's heart and countenance underwent a sudden change.

"What is a house for I would like to know, Mrs. Samp? And what is a man's wife for?"

He turned to her with a severe look.

"Ain't they to be live in and to be lived with? And what is a man for? Is he intended to be fish or a human, Mrs. Samp? He ain't got no gills in his throat, has he?"

The steps in Mr. Samp's philosophy were never interrupted by his wife. He did not expect an answer at any of these interrogation points leading up to a resounding period.

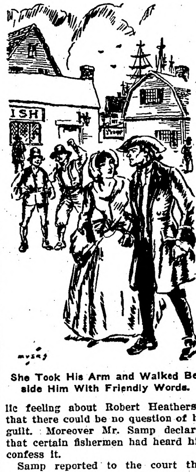
"I say the place for a man's feet is on the ground, Mrs. Samp, and the thing to be sucked into his lungs is air, not water."

He looked at the woman with a severe expression which seemed to say, "It's hard to put up with you, but for the Lord's sake I'il do it."

Convinced of his purity by his loud words and innocent look Mrs. Samp brought a wooden trencher and tin-covered iron spoons and bread and beer and meat to the table.

Such was life on the basest level of the parish.

The constable and his wife gave to their neighbors and to their friends in the church confirmation of the public feeling about Robert Heathers—that there could be no question of his guilt. Moreover Mr. Samp declared that certain fishermen had heard him confess it.



She Took His Arm and Walked Beside Him With Friendly Words.

Samp reported to the court that day. The governor questioned him.

"I reckon he see me first," Samp answered. "I chased him and Amos Todkill into the bush. They could run faster and had a mile the start o' me. I reckoned if I met any savages they'd kill and dress me for a good dinner, so I turned around."

This confirmed the opinion of the magistrates that William was unjustly confined. Mabel Hartley had died of a fever of the lungs and before dying had emphasized her statement to Sir Harry Vane. When the young man was elected to the governorship of the colony he moved for the release of William Heydon. The iron men who sat with him on the bench demurred. A compromise was effected. William was to be released and kept in the limits of the town. He was to wear a hempen noose around his neck with a tail two feet long until he was ready to help the cause of justice by telling the whole truth as he knew it.

In dismissing him Governor Vane made it clear that the punishment he had suffered and was still to suffer was not for the crime of adultery, but for his refusal to plead.

These were the best terms that could be secured for the young man. The confinement had impaired his health. Urged by his friends to do so he took the burden of the rope and bore it bravely and the easier because Roswell Brade and his family had returned to England.

CHAPTER VII

In the Hempen Noose

Men differ from all other creatures in their capacity for change. Sometimes the change is swift and impressive. There was a story in old Boston of a rough, law-defying sailorman who after ten minutes with Doctor Cotton was quickly changed into another type of human being. The seed of magic thoughts fell into fruitful soil and wrought its wonders in the spirit of the man so that he became a most useful and respected citizen.

The lonely confinement of William Heydon had wrought a great change in him. His pallor, his wasted form, his face worn by fevered anxieties, were the least of it. The change in the inner man was even greater. His pride, his resignation to conditions in the colony, his sympathy with the churchmen, who had so wrecked his life, were gone. His anger had passed. It had settled into a quiet, profound resentment of the wrongs committed in the name of God. He was perhaps more deeply religious and also a more determined rebel than ever he had been. What he should do about it he did not know, but his doing would have no defiant talk in it like that of Anne Hutchinson—like that which had come from his own mouth when he was a boy in England. The departure of the Brades had sorely distressed him. He knew that it was their pride which had sent them away. Pride was the master of well-born men and women. Yet he could not think it the way of love to fail when it is most needed.

Long letters had come to him from the banished Roger Williams, radical opponent of what he called the "magisterial aristocracy" of the Bay Colony. Williams had addressed him as a brother and a child of God. His letter had been full of friendly counsel and advice:

"I send this letter because you have come to a time when friendly words may comfort and help you and because I knew your father in England (he wrote). Pride will cause many to turn against you. Pride is a foolish and a cruel thing. It is one of the meanest and the worst of sins. When you are free, and a letter from Vane assures me that you are likely soon to be out of prison, you will have a chance to practice the virtue of forgiveness. I would have you remember that the poor and the ignorant are your brothers no less than the rich and the learned. Bear with them and help them to think and to think rightly. If you have a great spirit when you go forth, it will appear. An opportunity the like of which comes to few men shall be yours. Rule your own spirit and find your work and take upon yourself the grandeur of a noble humility. That, I assure you, is the beginning of great things."

William pondered over these words in the loneliness of his gloomy prison room. They fell into fruitful soil. Some of them put him in mind of things quite new to him.

William thought much in his lonely hours of the sheer cruelty of pride and of its folly. What a masterful motive it was—greater even than love! He knew many men who were proud of their ancestors, of their piety, of their riches, of their learning. How it belittled them and diminished their power! He said to himself that he liked better certain poor and humble folk he knew who were honest and who had nothing to be proud of. Always he sighed when he thought of the unfortunate Mabel Hartley. The young man had so changed that he had no serious dread of the noose to be put on his neck. Why should he care now? Still when the rope was on it seemed to choke him. For days it was a burden like the millstone of Holy Writ. It burned his neck. He could think of nothing else. He stayed at home yielding to his own pride.

Margaret Hooper, his housekeeper, said to him: "My boy, which is the stronger, you or this rope? It is a test of your soul. If your soul is the stronger I am sure that the Lord will use it to lead you unto great things. If not, the devil will use it to pull you down."

"You are right, Margaret," he answered. "After all what is this rope but my pride? I thought that I was done with it but I still have enough."

"To keep you in mind of the value of charity," said Margaret. "Go forth and learn to be humble. It is your great need. These are dark days but a great soul is like the tail of a firefly. It is made to shine in the dark."

The first time he went abroad with the rope many were staring at him. No one gave him a kindly word. Again pride was having its way. Some laborers raising a house jeered and called him a "trundle tail." This was what he expected. He came upon Peggy Weld. She took his arm and walked beside him with friendly words.

Linen "Textbooks" Used in Early Schoolrooms

"Your lesson for tomorrow will be on the blue handkerchief."

Children in the primary schools of Wisconsin, during the days of a century ago, fully realized the significance of the school marm's words.

In the absence of textbooks, linen handkerchiefs, full of prints depicting the great moments and the great men of history, were used to instruct the youngsters. This method was used to teach children how to read and to spell. Different lessons required different handkerchiefs.

Fortunately, little Mary and little Johnny did not have to tote pocketful references. A handkerchief a day made schooling pay.

In a shaded corridor of the Historical museum, on the University of Wisconsin campus, one may see the faded linen, once the pride of a studious child. George Washington is the lesson text. A full-length print of George in characteristic Napoleonic pose fills the center of the foot-square goods. To the right, in large type, still legible, are the birth, death and other vital facts.

PETER THE GREAT

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THE thing that broke Peter Tarbell's spirit was a ringing blow across the right cheek, administered to him, within full view of a crowded back-stage, by an extravaganza queen then in the full glory of her monarchistic reign.

As doorkeeper and general guardian of the constant runnel of traffic of one sort or another through the small office that led to the wings of the theater, Peter constituted a one-headed cerberus who stood guard against claimants for the attention of the high-handed musical comedy despot of the moment, Hilda Taypay.

A riot of colorful naughtinesses, temperamental outbursts, generosities, tempers, affabilities and nonsense of a brand that had captivated Broadway, to be in her troupe or associated in any way with her in the theater, was to be victim of her despotisms as well as recipient of her repentant favors.

Those who played with her, however, feared her more than they loved her, and it could not be said, even in the indulgent mood of wildest charity, that Hilda was kind to the lesser people about her. Impressed by greatness, she was capable of paying constant homage to those whose professional rank towered above hers. Little people she despised because, apparently, to be able to express her contempt emphasized her sense of power.

Thus it happened that on a spring morning during a rehearsal, Peter, admitting to the wings a young man whom he had been instructed by the great Taypay never to deny admission, found himself suddenly the public victim of her great wrath.

"How dare you," she screamed at Peter, hurling a distaff which she had been carrying in a dance number at him—"how dare you admit that swine to my presence? I never want to see him again!" and there in the full view of the assembled company, swung out an arm, full width, and let her hand bang resoundingly against the young doorkeeper's cheek.

It was one of those events that can come to a sleeper during nightmare; it was public humiliation of a sort that can cause the throat to close and the eyes to flash into blindness. There, in the presence of at least sixty people, many of the stage hands his personal friends, a woman, without the slightest just provocation, had slapped him in the face.

For an instant his impulse had been to leap at her and crush his fingers into her ornamental throat, but that impulse died almost as it was born. Aside from the impregnable solidity of her throne, and the power of her slightest word, there was only further indignity and humiliation and self-abasement to be gained by letting go of his wrath.

Peter Tarbell, then thirty, well salaried, ambitious, eager for advancement, turned without a word on his heel and walked out, while to the strain of the interrupted melody, extravaganza's darling, prancing distaff in hand, resumed rehearsal of the dance number she had been practicing.

There were fifty dollars for a half month's wages due Peter, which he never claimed. There were personal objects, books, papers, small baggage lying about the office which he never returned to collect. The one idea was to get away securely, permanently, quickly from the scene of his humiliation, to forget, if possible, the fiendish onslaught against his dignity and his peace of mind.

The theater and everything pertaining to it became anathema to the quiet-faced, unobtrusive young man, who from that day, for many a year to come, was to carry the sting from a woman's hand across his face and heart, and whose fingers, throughout the years, were to itch to throttle the white neck of Hilda Taypay.

It is, of course, difficult to hypothecate what would have been the destiny of Peter Tarbell had he remained in the atmosphere of the theater. It is, however, fair to assume he had been on the way to higher position, since his rise had been steady from call-boy to general manager of affairs of rear stage.

Be that as it may, from the day Peter walked out, his destiny fell along lesser lines. At forty he was superintendent of a huge apartment house on the residential upper west side of New York. Eleven men worked under him, electricians, janitors, elevator boys and furnace-room men, but in reality, Peter's position, while the salary was practically that of the stage-door regime, was little above that of a managing janitor. His jobs were chiefly menial chores. Locks to be repaired on apartment doors; foyers and elevators to be kept in show state; vacant apartments to be shown to prospective tenants and altercations of one sort or another to be adjusted between his help.

There were compensations, of course. He had married, meanwhile, a quiet, enormously strong and quite personable girl who had been employed as housemaid in one of the apartments of the building in which he was employed. There were no children. Peter would have liked it, had there been. With the strange pride of the frustrated, strong Tessa would never admit her disappointment.

At fifty, Tessa, with one of those quick corrosive changes which can sometimes attack the strong, began to succumb to a cruel form of rheumatism which knotted her joints so that within a period of two years she became practically bed-ridden. It was terrible to be forced to behold the slow disintegration of the magnificent body that had been Tessa's, and with the physical, there began slowly and surely to sink into desuetude the mental. A companionable, sweet-natured and helpful woman began to slump into a querulous, bed-ridden invalid, half frantic most of the time with pain; intolerant of it, all of the time.

Poor Peter! The spectacle of Tessa, slipping into her invalidism was one which he could only watch with a sense of helpless despair. More and more, her predicament became a drain upon his time and energies.

At fifty-five he had lost the position of superintendent over the large upper west side apartment house, and on smaller pay, and in quarters much more cramped, was presiding over the tawdry destinies of a six-story tenement house on the lower east side. This time his living quarters were two rooms below the level of the sidewalk, and his monthly stipend less than half of what it had been in the larger building. And yet in some ways life was easier. The little apartment he shared with the now completely bed-ridden Tessa, meant fewer hours to devote to the chores of keeping the household moving.

And yet, there was about the environment of this house something so depressing that it seemed to Peter, struggling always with the problem of keeping afloat the sinking spirits of Tessa, as if the rows of days were simply too drab to face. It was not alone his own plight, but day after day there marched before his troubled eyes the woes of the poverty-stricken, the lame, the halt, the blind, who dwelt around them. Evictions, for reasons of poverty or sickness, were not unusual in the house where he acted in the capacity of janitor-of-all-work. Usually this unsavory task fell to him.

It was a grim, bitter job, this business of being janitor to the poverty-stricken families of the building. Sickness lurked under that roof, crime, grime and sometimes even hunger. One old woman, as a matter of fact, had been found dead in her rear apartment of a simple complaint easily diagnosed. Hunger. Little wonder that Tessa, who had always been sensitive to pain of others, lay there not only drenched in her own misery, but seeming to feel, with the antennae of her intuition, the poverty that lay everywhere around her.

Babies cried in the tenements at night. Late unsteady footsteps lurched upstairs. Women in labor pains cried out in the agony of bringing more life into these lusterless homes. From time to time there sped in horror through the dank and narrow house news of a child run over by a truck; the wage-earning head of a household falling from a scaffolding; the son of a household turning gangster and facing the death house—

Lean mean years filled with terror of one sort of another, but through it all Peter and Tessa clinging fast to the murky nest of the two rear rooms they called home and as time moved on Peter becoming more and more obsessed with the fear of losing his job through having to give more and more time to the task of tending Tessa.

The night that he found a ruin of a woman propped up against the door as he was about to enter his apartment proved a memorable one. She was a gin-fogged creature with deep ruts of suffering and dissipation down the still white flesh of her face. A wreck of a woman with a strange suggestion of splendor left to her.

It was while he was picking her up to carry her out to the curb and turn her over to the mercies of the corner policeman, that recognition came to Peter. Recognition, and a flash of anger so blinding that it seemed to him for a moment that here, now nothing could prevent his digging talons into the throat of the creature before him. Pent up in him, all through the years, were passions about to be released. Here in his arms a derelict, a remnant, a skeleton of comic opera, was the object of his lifetime of hatred. . . .

Somehow again, once more, it did not work out that way. Peter's talons did not sink in to blemish that last remnant of the beauty of Hilda's throat. He has given her roof, and in her befogged way she knows that a janitor, whom at heart she despises for being a menial has come to her succor.

There are two women for Peter to tend now. The helpless Tessa and the curious temperamental derelict whom they have taken into their home. Sometimes she sings and creates the farore of cracked melody and pitiful dance in the little tenement they all share together.

Sometimes she rises in wrath and strikes the old janitor whose humble lot she shares.

Splendor for Dogs

Dogs that are paraded by women owners along Park avenue, and other thoroughfares are usually clad in coats of many colors, brushed and groomed to the nth degree. The latest in sartorial elegance, recently observed, is a dog's coat having a small side pocket from which, neatly folded, protrudes a monogrammed handkerchief. Its utility is puzzling.

Birds Pay Tribute to Singer's Golden Voice

Ninon Vallin, the French operatic star, is a woman St. Francis, one of her most regular and devoted audiences consisting of hundreds of small birds which come flying to the window of her home in France as soon as she starts singing. They stay perched on the window-sills and even on the piano until she stops. "I have always adored birds," she explained, in very broken English, to a reporter. "When I was little I had a lot of them in cages, but my father hated to see them in captivity. So he let them out in the garden, but instead of flying away, they stayed and used to swarm round me whenever I started to sing." Asked how she first started her career, Madame Vallin replied smilingly, "In church. Some influential people had heard my voice in church, and insisted on my trying first in Lyons, then in Paris, with the result that after singing at a charity performance Da Costa heard me and immediately booked me for a huge tour in South America. Since then," she added laughing, "I have never stopped singing."

LET'S PARK AND PICNIC

PICNICS, which passed out of fashion somewhat when refreshment-stands popped up along the highways offering everything from New England sea-food chowders to Southern barbecue sandwiches, are being revived in a new and interesting form. Instead of the big market-basket filled with bulky ham sandwiches, a glass jar of potato salad, some hard-boiled eggs and home-made cake, the modern picnic takes on something of the atmosphere of a smart supper party, its menu including delicacies from cocktail to nuts.

The party starts with the packing of the picnic supper. For the modern hostess has no notion of toiling in the kitchen the night before the party, baking cakes and good things, and rising early in the morning to wrap and pack them so that everything will be in readiness for the guests. Instead she phones the delicatessen and the bakery and has her list of good things on hand. Then, when her friends come in, she enlists their services.

Shaker, Slices and Spreads

Someone is delegated to shake up a fruit cocktail—or a tomato drink which is especially refreshing and appetizing—and have it ready in the thermos bottle or jug. Someone else slices three kinds of bread—white, rye and whole-wheat in paper-thin slices, butters them and wraps them in waxed paper, ready for making sandwiches "on the location" from cold sliced meats, sardines, canned sandwich spreads, canned cheese and other delicacies.

Or sometimes a repertoire of "different" sandwiches are selected and quickly prepared, and some cold meats, anchovies and other dainties are taken along in their respective containers ready to arrange as an assortment of hors-d'œuvres on an attractive wooden lacquer tray with wooden fork, just before the feast begins.

Preparing the "Eats"

Crisp lettuce leaves are wrapped in cheese cloth and these form the garnish for a fruit salad which can be quickly made from a can of assorted fruits packed for this purpose. Mayonnaise goes along in a can or jar, all ready to top the salad.

Nuts, either salted or plain, can be bought in cans, and these, served in paper cups, put the "supper-party" finish to the menu. The food should be attractively wrapped. Most women keep on hand colorful tin boxes in which the holiday candy or fruit cake was contained, for this particular purpose.

The following tested recipes for new sandwiches may prove helpful:

Sardine and Beet Sandwiches: Spread rye bread with softened butter, then with a very thin coating of mustard. Arrange several boned sardines on each slice, cover with thinly sliced beet-pickles and top with another slice of buttered bread.

Deviled Peanut Sandwiches: Mix together the contents of one small can of deviled ham, one-third cup peanut butter, a few grains of salt and one-fourth cup of mayonnaise. Spread between buttered slices of graham bread.

Swiss Date Sandwiches: Slice the contents of a can of Swiss cheese thin, and place on buttered whole wheat bread. Mix equal quantities of chopped dates and nuts and moisten with mayonnaise. Spread this mixture on the cheese, and cover with another slice of bread.

Crab-and-Egg Sandwiches: Remove tendons from one-half of a 6½-ounce can of crabmeat, add one hard-cooked chopped egg and moisten with mayonnaise. Add a little lemon juice to make tart, and spread between thin slices of buttered white bread.

Selvig Home From Tour Of Europe

Congressman Studied Agricultural Situation In Foreign Lands

Congressman and Mrs. C. G. Selvig returned home recently from a tour of nine European countries in which Mr. Selvig studied agricultural conditions "first hand" says the Crookston Daily Times.

They were accompanied on their foreign trip by Professor and Mrs. P. E. Miller. Prof. Miller is head of the State College experiment station, Morris, Minnesota.

"We talked to officers of marketing associations in many of the countries and in some cases cabinet officers in charge of agriculture," Congressman Selvig said. "We found the Danish farmer solving his own problems.

"He wants the government to keep out. 'We want to be left alone,' they told us. The farmers of Denmark are handling to the consumer all agricultural products. Thru their export association they export 71 per cent of the total value of farm products.

"Their central guiding association, the Landbrugs Raadet, studies market prices and the conditions for them. The Raadet compares to our federal farm board, but it is organized, not by the government, but by the farmers themselves."

Although Mr. and Mrs. Selvig enjoyed the trip, both said they were glad to be home. "The United States, Minnesota and Crookston look better," he said.

Germany, he added, was in a deplorable condition, and expressed the opinion that President Hoover's debt moratorium would aid materially conditions there.

"Germans pay 15 per cent of their wages to the goverment," the congressman continued. "This is done whether they are day laborers or wealthy workers. This is in addition to the countrys property, automobile, and income taxes. Germans are subjected to the most stringent tax system I ever have had occasion to observe and study.

"Food prices are high—probably because it was found necessary to bolster prices to pay taxes.

"France was bright with prosperity. There is practically no unemployment there. The country does however, use more men for a job than we do in America. In Italy, for example, there were 20 men in an 80 acre field, while here we could use two men."

Mr. and Mrs. Selvig will remain here throughout the summer and fall until the next session of congress.

Grasshoppers Overrun Country

There are more grasshoppers here this summer than there has been for several years. Turkey flocks are busy all day eating hoppers and they get fat on the job.

BRING YOUR CREAM EARLY

Modern business and manufacturing methods are carried on with an efficiency our grandfathers would never have dreamed possible. Products are turned out in such volumes and with such speed that the ordinary man can hardly grasp the immensity.

But nevertheless it takes about 5 hours to pasteurize and cool 1200 gallons of cream, and if we don't get started before 3 o'clock we can't get thru before 8 o'clock. Kindly bring your cream early.

This Paper Started 20 Years Ago

Chas. W. Latta Inaugurated "The Northern Light," Aug. 4th, 1911, Which Later Became the Holt Weekly News

Twenty years ago, Chas. W. Latta made his initial bow to the people of Holt in Vol. 1, No. 1 of "The Northern Light." This paper was the first one to be published in Holt and, as the Holt Weekly News is but a continuation, it was the only one.

Holt was at that time enjoying a boom, as the Mud Lake territory had been thrown open for homesteading. Hundreds of people visited these parts and left a streak of prosperity in their wake. It was but natural that a newspaper should commence, as it was, in Latta's words, a "long-felt-want-filler."

Mr. Latta had come here from Crookston, where he had published the Leader for some time. He was an able writer, absolutely fearless, a non-conformist in politics—a regular old-time editor. His little paper sizzled with denunciation at rare intervals, but in the main his "line" was good-humored wit, peppered with occasional jibes at those who seemed out of plumb with his idea of things.

Latta put out a creditable first issue of 8 pages, 6 of which were ready-prints, and had in his line up of advertisers such names as J. O. Quistberg (Farm Lands), P. A. Risberg (Evergreen Hotel), S. S. Kolden & Co. (Hardware), Nels Engebretson (Agent, Red Lake Falls Milling Co.), C. H. Gunheim (Merchant), Arvid and A. L. Carlson (Holt Mercantile Co.), B. L. Backe (Holt State Bank), Oscar Hanson (Hanson & Barzen Milling Co.), Sam Mikkelson (The Farmers' Home Restaurant), and M. A. Nelson, M. D.

Some news items from this first issue of "The Northern Light" follow:

Ludvig Monson and Oscar Knudson left on Wednesday for Laugdon, N. D., where they intend to spend the harvest season.

S. S. Kolden, Ed. Ellingson and Erick Knudson left on Wednesday for Fargo to bring up a threshing outfit which the last two named gentlemen have just purchased.

Martin Mattson was in Tuesday evening from his home southeast of town to look after some business matters. Mr. Mattson has a good sized field of flax that is an unusually fine crop, and the prospects are that it will yield enough to put its owner in the automobile class when harvested.

It is worthy of comment that three passenger coaches are now being run every day on the train over this line. It goes to show that the Great Northern Officials recognize the fact that passenger traffic in this part of the country is about 50 per cent greater than it was a year ago.

Nels Engebretson had the honor of being the first resident of Holt to hand in a dollar for a year's subscription to this paper.

Miss Christine Reierson went to Thief River Falls to make a visit with friends and take in the sights at the County Fair.

A picked up ball team from Holt drove to Humboldt [north of Holt] on Sunday and played a game of ball that ended in a score of 17 to 6 in favor of the Holt boys. During the first three innings the home team had all the best of it and then the visitors began stealing some bases. They stole all the bases several times over, and might have swiped the diamond if they did not have a better one at home.

1911 was the year after the big fire at Baudette; the dry weather had stunted the grain and hay crops on the prairies, so the advice was given in The Northern Light to cut the immense hay crop in Mud Lake. Hay was then selling for $13 a ton on the track. Flax was $1.94, wheat 85c, barley 48c and oats 45c.

We intend to print a few items each week under the heading "20 Years Ago." Watch for this feature.

Mrs. S. H. Nohre and daughter Hilma visited at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Olson on Monday afternoon.

Hubert Pavick and family of Whitehall, Wisconsin spent the week end here visiting with old friends and relatives.

F. K. Frederickson and family and Hj. Johnson and family were entertained at the Oliver Nohre home on Sunday.

Rev. and Mrs. L. M. Redal and family returned here this week from a months vacation thru the lake region in Minnesota.

Miss Viola Haugen who has been employed at the Holt Cafe has quit her job there and will soon go to Chicago to work.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Wegge and Mr. Elmer Pearson motored to Alvarado and Argyle last Sunday to visit with Mr. Pearson's sister and father.

Alberts Animal Circus showed here Wednesday nite and the crowd was not of the size that makes a showman's pocketbook open up and smile.

Olaf Hagen left Monday for Minneapolis where he will enter Veterans hospital to undergo an operation for an injury he got while serving in the World War.

Several farmers in this community have this week started to harvest their crops. Barley, Oats and rye have been cut and according to reports the yield will be good.

Mr. and Mrs. C. O. Saastad and family, Mrs. Fred Peterson and daughters, of Holt; Mrs. A. Bjorkman and daughter Ruth, Mrs. Emma Nelson, and Victor Lamberg, of Rapid River, Mich.; Nils Dahlman and A. Beckstroom of Alvarado, were dinner guests at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. Maruska at Thief River Falls on Sunday.

4-H Club Tour

The 4-H Club will have their tour on Sunday, August 2, leaving Holt at 10 o'clock. The first stop will be at the F. D. Voth farm, and so on down the line, reaching Ludvig Sagstuen's by noon, where the club members will have their lunch together. After that there will be a kitten-ball game. Visitors are welcome. Please bring your lunch.

Card of Thanks

In behalf of the Nazareth Lutheran church I wish to thank all those who made cash donations to help pay for the work of shingling the parsonage and, all those whom donated their time and work, also the members of the Ladies Aid who donated free coffee and lunch.

Sheaf Celebrates Anniversary

Mattson Brothers, publishers of The Warren Sheaf put out a fine thirty page edition last week, July 22, in commemoration of their 50th anniversary. They dedicated this issue to their father, John P. Mattson, who had been editor of the Sheaf for 44 years, and to the pioneers of Marshall county.

The Sheaf did much in the early days to help establish this county and has since its begining given the public a clean newsy paper each week, and has at all times played a fair and square game with its neighbor papers.

We congratulate you upon you success.

Terrible Heat Wave Broken

The heat wave that raged on over the northwest during the week end was busted up some Monday nite when light rain, hail and heavy wind storms passed over the northwest.

Several hundred lives were lost in the terrific heat which at many places registered 100 to 120 and over in the shade.

We had 104 above here for two days and thats hot.

Free Camp Ground at the State Fair

Scouts of Five N.W. States Will Demonstrate At the State Fair

That many persons are plnning to combine their summer outing with a visit to the Minnesota Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, September 5 to 12, is indicated by the number of requests for reservations at the free tourist camp at the Fair grounds, according to Leland Melrose of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, in charge.

Located in a beautiful grove adjacent to and with a gate opening into the Fair grounds proper, the camp is provided with all conveniences for living in the open, and is an attractive tenting spot for families and parties. The main entrance is from Snelling avenue, north of the Fair grounds gates.

All State Fair visitors are welcome to avail themselves of the camp facilities, and to insure accomodations, reservations may be made by application to Mr. Melrose at the Farm Bureau offices in the Old Capitol, St. Paul.

The free tourist camp is one of several tented villages that will spring up at the State Fair. An attraction of the Boy Scout Camp will be a real Indian village with native tepees. The second annual Boy Scout Camp and Indian Village will be conducted by Region Ten, comprised of Scouts of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, eastern Montana and northwestern Wisconsin. There will be demonstrations of whistle drills, fire by friction, first aid, tower construction and signaling, rope making, baking bread on a stick and other Boy Scout activities. Indians in native dress will appear in tribal dances and ceremonials.

Another prominent educational feature of the fair will be the Farm Boy's Camp, where two farm boys from each Minnesota county who have made outstanding records in 4-H Club work will live during Fair week.

—14—

"How dare you do this?" he asked.

"I would not have you forget that I am a Christian," she answered. "And I do not forget that you are the best friend of Robert Heathers."

"I remember Robert used to tell me that he loved you."

"And I tell you that I love him. All my friends have been opposing me about it and saying hard things, but they do not shake my purpose. I think that you and I are the only friends of his in this new world."

"It is curious that we should meet as we do," said William. "I could love you myself for all this. The last time that Robert and I sat down for a talk together he was in despair because you were engaged to Rosewell."

"What a joy to hear you say it! I found soon that I could not love Rosewell and that I was deeply in love with Robert. I wonder if he has forgotten me."

"No. Wherever he is you may be sure that you are in every hour of his life. I know him as the eagle knows his mate. He was not easily moved. He scoffed at my enthusiasms. The love of a man for a maid had never touched him until he met you. Then, for the first time, he showed the white flag. I would bet my worthless, noosed neck that Robert has been thinking of you a hundred times this very day."

She turned to him with a look of joy and sympathy, saying:

"These are the sweetest words that have ever come to my ears. I have been starving for comfort with every one against me. My heart is stubborn. It would not give up. It would not even let me go home to my people. I have had to stay here and see this through. Is it the wisdom of a woman's heart that has sustained me?"

He answered: "It is all this opposition that has held you steadfast."

"At last I am rewarded with good news," she said. "The astrologer tells me that my lover will be coming soon."

William smiled. He had little faith in the arts of the astrologer in which the women of that time put a large dependence. He was, however, astonished at the greatness of her heart.

The two passed a number of ragged children who looked curiously at the rope on William's neck and soon began throwing pebbles at him. Peggy Weld put an end to their mischief. That was the beginning of the great things in the promise of Margaret Hooper and Roger Williams. Young Heydon had long been thinking of the children of the poor who were growing up in ignorance. They were the most pressing problem of the colony. There were a number of young ladies in Boston like Peggy Weld, with nothing to do. He made a plan for organizing the male children of the toilers into groups and for interesting the young ladies in the task of teaching them reading and writing, the love of cleanliness and decency and fair play.

Vane gave him hearty support. He and William supplied the money for a rough inexpensive structure in which the young boys were taught. It was equipped with benches and blackboards. The work began and prospered. The seamen, the goodmen and their wives brought their children to this haven of new hope. The young ones enjoyed the teaching, the play and the rewards. The church and the court were deeply interested. The ministers, deacons and magistrates were coming often to see the astonishing progress of the learners. Volunteers were offering help. Winthrop said that no better work had been done in the New world. The work was transferred to the ampler accommodations of the meeting house and Philander Porman and Daniel Maude—two learned men—were engaged by the court to do the teaching.

Meanwhile William Heydon, out in the bay with his boat, had saved two people from drowning. He was returning in his canoe from a visit to his friend Henry Blaxton. He went immediately to their relief. The panic-stricken pair upset his canoe and dashed him into deep water. Fortunately they were not more than a fathom's length from good footing. One of those saved was a daughter of the magistrate John Haynes. The girl, as fate would have it, clung to the rope on William's neck, while the other was dragged to shallow water in his left hand.

The next day Vane prevailed upon the court to pardon him. The rope was removed from his neck and again at last he was a citizen. He joined the military company. He visited and helped the poor. Their dialect, their droll and rugged humor interested him. The flavor of the soil and the salt sea was in it. He became a popular man, and even the church folk gave him a welcome in their homes.

Peggy Weld and her brother had taken ship to New Amsterdam and were going north from there to the Lake of the Iroquois and perhaps to Kebec to find Robert Heathers.

Those who could not accept the sanctity of all the ancient Hebraic teaching were driven out of the colony. The brilliant antinomain Anne Hutchinson still tarried, having won the favor of the ladies of the parish because of her wit and charm. Governor Vane was severely criticized for giving countenance and support to her theories. It was evident that even the friendship of the influential women could not long delay her exile.

Such a quenching of the sparks of contention was not to the taste of the generous John Winthrop. The church was filled with dark sayings—a pretentious babbling as to the merits of sanctification and justification.

Yet every Sabbath a warden drummed the people out of their comfortable homes and hailed them to church. All had to go and assume a look of piety while they shivered for hours in a dank cold atmosphere in no way improved by a dank and molded theology. William and Vane and others were Gospel-glutted.

William Heydon rode across country to see Roger Williams. At his fireside he met the distinguished Thomas Hooker. He sat for a day in the company of these great, free-minded Puritans who upheld the right of the individual to find his belief without coercion. He aroused their enthusiasm by telling of his work. That day he saw these men chiseling the spiritual blocks which were to be the foundation of a structure, immense and wonderful. They were these:

"The beginning of authority is the free consent of the governed," said the courageous, brown-bearded, gray-eyed Hooker, who had worked his way through Cambridge as a sizar in his college dining room.

"And God knows neither Jew nor Gentile, rank nor caste," said the iron-gray, amply mustached Roger Williams. "The spirit of love manifested in the love of a man for his neighbor is the big thing. There can be no love of God without it. If neighbors are not loveable we must make them so."

Both agreed that the safety of the colonies lay in the education of the poor.

William went away encouraged by the friendship of these men. Their ideals had given him a new understanding of life and a new zest for it. Leaving there he took medicine and a nurse to a tribe of Indians who were dying, like rotten sheep, of the smallpox.

Meanwhile new evidence regarding Robert Heathers came to Governor Vane. Samp had brought some hint of it to Boston. James Rosewell had gone up the coast on the tavern ship. He went ashore at the fishing camp where Amos and Robert, fleeing from John Samp, had set out to cross the wilderness. He suspected that the fugitive was still lingering in that part of the woods. Moreover definite word had come to Boston that one Edward Mellowes, in that camp, had important information. Rosewell found him.

"I won't go down there and spend a week or two for nothing," said Mellowes. "I'm a poor man. I have to work for my living."

"If you have good evidence, I will see that you have a fair allowance for your time."

Mellowes answered: "While the tavern ship was lying here that time a shallop turned in from Boston. Her captain said that a man named Heydon was being tried for adultery and was likely to be hung in spite of his being a blue-blooded gentleman. The young chap, who was with Todkill, said to me: 'If they hang Heydon they will hang the wrong man. I know that he is innocent.'

"'How do you know that?' I asked. I reckon he didn't expect to be questioned. He changed color and stammered a little and said: 'The guilty man ran away that night.'

"I didn't know or care who he was. I didn't know when the tavern ship left Boston. I was spreeing all night and went up the coast fishing next day."

Thus a gibbet was being erected for Robert Heathers.

CHAPTER VIII

The Capture

Peggy Weld and her brother took a ship north from New Amsterdam to Fort Orange while Robert Heathers and Amos Todkill were still in the pathless waste.

Robert was weary after ten days of climbing and crawling and sloshing and tiptoeing and whispering in this interminable wilderness beset with perils. He had grown thin and irritable.

"Don't get pheesy," Amos said to him. "I reckon we'll be at the big lake soon. Then I'll give ye a ride and ye can rest yer nags."

They came about nightfall to the edge of a small lake. It was about a quarter of a mile in width and some two miles long. The deep silence of its wild lonely setting was broken by the distant chattering of a porcupine. They drank the lake water and ate of their meat and meal.

"Oh, God! I'm weary." Robert whispered as he lay back and spread his arms to the mossy ground.

"I don't like the feel o' this," said Amos. "We'll push on a little and nose into a thicket and lie down."

They found a stand of young pine and spruce on high ground not a falcon-shot from the lake. Under its cover they lay down. Their heads were no sooner on the ground than they heard loud cries in the distant forest. Amos sat up and listened.

A loud splashing broke the silence.

"Two canoes!" Amos whispered. "The killers have come. It's savages driving game toward the lake on the farther shore," said he. "We're lucky not to be there. A band of red men—maybe fifty or more—start miles back about a hundred feet apart and drive shoreward. The killers are layin' in canoes on the lake. They have sharp lances o' ironwood. When the game takes water they thrust the lances to its heart and drag it out. They'll have a big fire and a feast down there. If there's meat enough they'll eat themselves stiff and sleep for two days."

The wild cries were coming near the lake. Weird echoes chased one another far and wide in the wooded solitudes. Suddenly they ceased. There was a great splashing in the water below. Then the angry roaring of a moose in his death struggles and a shrilling "like that of a stampede of demons in the dooryard of hell," to quote from a quillet in the diary of Robert Heathers. The killing went on while the beasts groaned and strove, helpless in the water. It ceased in the space of a few minutes. The tumult dimmed to a low chatter. They heard the crackling of fire, and soon, through their close-knit lattice of pine needles, they could see the glow of its flames.

In a moment shrill cries of anguish leaped heavenward and sped away over the ridges. They sank into frightful, sobbing, aspirated groans and rose again into a strained, tremulous far-reaching, bugle note of agony. It was mingled with a hoarse background of devilish and gleeful laughter.

"My God!" Robert exclaimed. "Are they torturing a white man?"

Amos answered: "I do not think so. I have heard the like o' that before. It were the voice of a savage. He were imitatin' a white man under torture. Our nerves be like a fiddle string. We holler when we are hurt to the bone. We can't help it. Groans are music to them fiends o' hell. They sing or make no sound when they be put to torture. If they show that they feel pain they die disgraced. I reckon they have no more nerves than a muskrat. That fellow give a good imitation. But I knew it were fun-makin'. A white man would have had somethin' to say to God or he'd 'a' cursed 'em a murth in good French, Dutch or English. I reckon we better get away from this stinkin' hog wallow for fear they'll make a drive on this side tomorrow. I got the lay o' the land afore dark. This ridge goes north. We'll cat-foot to its top and grope along till midnight."

They shouldered their packs and cautiously moved on while the Indians were shouting and dancing and yelping around their fire. That night Robert carried the heavier burden. He got a reaction from the torture cries which he noted in his diary as follows:

"As I lay back on the ground and listened to the cries of agony they seemed to come from my own heart. God! I think it would relieve me if I could lie on my back and sob and yell for an hour as I used to do when I was a child."

Slowly, in the exciting days that followed, the sharpness of his worries wore away. But often when he slept he dreamed of the gallows and its rope.

The weather favored them. It was a time when snow and cold winds were overdue but still the Indian summer lingered. The days were pleasant, the hazy wooded peaks and ranges bathed in sunlight. At last from a mountaintop they saw the great Lake of the Iroquois, a long, water-filled basin reaching far north and south between two ranges, shown in the familiar map of Champlain.

Health Associated With Slimness and Laughter

The old advice, "Laugh and grow fat," is out of date. Not many years ago fatness was regarded as a sign of robust health, but we know now that it is undesirable even in babies or young children.

Dr. Lechmere Anderson, medical officer for Doncaster, England, claims that the phrase should be "Laugh and grow healthy." "Laughter," he says, "is essentially associated with good health, but adipose tissue, if at all undue, cannot be regarded as a favorable condition. Leanness of body is far more likely to be associated with strength and energy."

The fat person, he explains, has to make his heart and his muscles work far harder than they were designed to do, since they are called upon to deal with an extra load of from one to many pounds. For those who wish to become slim and healthy Doctor Anderson recommends the taking of little sugar, bread, or starchy foods—and laughter.

Imposing Title

Titles of early American text books were not composed with the thought of brevity uppermost in the mind of the composer, it would appear from the title given an English reader of 1841, which was: "Elegant Selections in Prose and Poetry Designed to Improve the Highest Class of Learners in Reading to Establish a Taste for Just and Accurate Composition, and to Promote the Interests of Piety and Virtue."—Detroit News.

Fewer Varieties of Apples Help

Growers Urged to Improve Practices for Better Fruit.

There are more than 800 standard varieties of apples in orchards in the United States. In the Cumberland-Shenandoah states there are 300 or more varieties. Only a few of these hundreds of varieties are, or probably ever will be, of real commercial importance, according to United States Department of Agriculture and state economists, who emphasize that producers need to satisfy the exacting demands of consumers for high quality fruit.

Crop Goes to Europe.

A survey of apple marketings from the Cumberland-Shenandoah states, made by department economists in cooperation with the agricultural colleges in Virginia, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, shows that in some years 60 per cent of the commercial crop from this region goes to Europe, principally to England. The export market is the mainstay of the Cumberland-Shenandoah producers, but they are encountering increasing competition from northwestern apple growers.

To satisfy both domestic and foreign markets the growers in the Cumberland-Shenandoah region are urged to improve orchard practices so as to produce a larger volume of unblemished fruit, and to practice strict and uniform grading and packing methods. It is suggested, also, that extension of the marketing season through storage, and the development of home markets by catering to the customary preferences of the trade, promise some enhancement in net returns to growers.

The investigators report that a large part of the apple production of the Cumberland-Shenandoah region is of varieties that are of generally recognized worth. More than 50 per cent of the trees in commercial orchards in the region are of the varieties: York Imperial, Stayman Winesap, Winesap, and Delicious. Ten varieties constitute 70 per cent of the trees. The York Imperial is the variety most commonly grown, and approximately 50 per cent of the trees are less than nineteen years old and only about 7 per cent are less than nine years old, so that there is no present indication, in the opinion of the economists, of any increase in the market supplies of this variety.

Supplies of Delicious.

If plantings of the last eight to ten years can be taken as a guide, there is every indication, they point out, that market supplies of the Delicious will increase markedly as the trees of this variety, which are planted in the region and in nearly every other major apple state from coast to coast, come into bearing and approach full bearing capacity. In 1928 probably 96 per cent of the Delicious trees of the country were less than nineteen years old, and more than 50 per cent were less than nine years old.

Make Power Sprayer Do More Work Around Farm

Too many farmers use their power sprayer only six or eight days per year, thus making the interest and depreciation costs per day quite high. By a little study and ingenuity its use can be increased several times over. It can be used for potatoes and for fruits and berries; for white-washing and disinfecting sprays for poultry houses, hog houses, and stables; for pumping water for garden and truck irrigation and for poultry and for hogs under the McLean system. Now if the owner will work up some custom work along each of these lines, either for hire or for exchange, he can greatly increase his season's total days.

Kill Pocket Gophers

Pocket gophers, which burrow down 3 to 14 inches and throw up a pile of dirt that makes it inconvenient to cultivate fields, can be killed easily with powdered strychnine sprinkled on sweet potatoes, carrots or oats. One-eighth ounce of the strychnine dusted over three quarts of the sweet potatoes, cut into small pieces and dropped into the runs will often clean out a colony. Pieces two inches long and a half-inch square make desirable sizes to drop into the runs.

Why Alfalfa Fails

A poor seedbed is possibly responsible for more failures to obtain a good stand of alfalfa than any other one thing, according to L. E. Willoughby, Kansas State college. The essential conditions for a good seedbed are a firm, well-settled soil, which is finely pulverized and mellow to the depth at which the seed is to be placed. The soil should be so handled as to have a good supply of available moisture and plant nutrients at seeding time.

Making Sweet Cider

From the New York experiment station comes a new method of clarifying cider so that it can be bottled clear and pasteurized, leaving it like cider fresh from the apple. If the apple industry were run by a corporation, a new method of this kind would mean a great opening for new business. It is not a very profitable thing for the fruit industry to have the soft drinks of the country made of sugar and water and flavored often with synthetic flavors.

Immunize All Pigs to Prevent Cholera

Advisable to Apply Treatment Before Weaning.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Swine growers in localities where there is danger of hog cholera may prevent future losses in their herds by immunizing the spring pigs against the disease, says Dr. T. P. White, veterinarian of the bureau of animal industry, United States Department of Agriculture. Even if hog cholera has never occurred on the immediate premises, there is always a possibility that infection may be introduced into the herd through various channels when the disease exists anywhere in the neighborhood.

Pigs from immune sows have a degree of natural immunity against cholera, but this protection lasts only while they obtain all their nourishment from the sow. It gradually diminishes as the pigs grow and by the time they are weaned the immunity has entirely disappeared. It is therefore advisable to apply the treatment before the pigs are weaned in order to insure protection against the disease. The pigs are more easily handled at that age and the cost of immunization is considerably less than when they are older and larger.

Guard Against Injury Done by Common Worms

Corn ear worms are so common in this country that most farmers do not consider it worth while to make efforts to fight them, but tests conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture show that ears with long, tight husks suffer less than half as much injury as ears having short, loose husks.

Ears with long, tight husks are characteristic in some varieties, the department says, but there is enough variation in all varieties for a farmer to select for seed only ears with long, tight husks. In this way he can build up a strain having better husk characteristics.

Long, tight husks are also good protection from other insect pests of corn, such as the corn weevil, in sections where corn is stored in the husks. This is an additional reason for farmers to select their corn in the field, where they can give proper consideration to the type of husk.

Avoid Beetle Injury to Young Asparagus Plants

Beetle injury to young asparagus shoots may be avoided by cutting the crop clean every three to five days. In this way all the eggs deposited on the shoots will be removed before they hatch or soon afterwards. All volunteer plants should be destroyed and it will often pay to have a row here and there uncut to serve as a trap on which the beetles will congregate, feed, and lay their eggs. Here they may be poisoned with calcium arsenate or lead arsenate. After the cutting season, plants may be protected from beetle injury by two or three applications of calcium-arsenate or lead arsenate dust, 5 pounds mixed with 85 pounds of hydrated lime.

The use of poultry for the destruction of the beetle is practiced with good results in some localities.

Control of Weeds Most Important With Flax

The control of weeds is probably one of the most important things to consider in growing flax, says the Iowa State college. That is also one reason why newly broken soil free from weeds has generally been used.

Now that wilt-resistant varieties have been developed, wilt-free soil is only essential from the standpoint of weed control. In the last few years several large-seeded, wilt-resistant varieties have been isolated—Bison, Buda and Rio. Last year the Bison variety surpassed all other large-seeded varieties in the Iowa experiments. The Bison variety appeared particularly well adapted to early planting, the April 30 seeding yielding highest.

Farm Hints

Agriculture is the foundation of all business.

* * *

Keep each colony queen right continuously throughout the breeding season.

* * *

Experiments show rape to have about the same value as a hog pasture as red clover.

* * *

Haphazard exchange of seed frequently leads to a wider spread of disease, weeds and insects.

* * *

There is no substitute in farm products for quality and the American buying public is willing to pay well for it.

* * *

Give the asparagus bed a dressing of good fertilizer. It won't hurt it to salt it but it won't do any particular good and besides it is a waste of salt.

* * *

A layer of broken stone or gravel 3 or 4 inches thick, placed under a concrete floor will prevent dampness and moisture from coming through the floor.

* * *

Alfalfa meal is about the best source of vitamins for pigs in dry lot. A small amount daily of some green crop, such as kale, can also be used to advantage.

He Was Searching for Cinderella

By LEETE STONE

(©, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service.)

IT CAME to pass that one could go hardly anywhere or become a part of any leisurely conversation without the name of Basil Jocelyn cropping up in one way or another. It was, "Basil Jocelyn's a judge of the contest;" "Did you listen to Basil Jocelyn on the radio last night?" or "Have you read Basil Jocelyn's feature story about Borneo in this week's 'Panorama'?" In other words, Basil Jocelyn, American, thirty-six, starting to run his race from the average intelligent home, possessing average intelligent parents; had become, somewhat before middle age, a figure of national importance, discussed more widely and of far greater glamour than the nation's President.

How come? A natural question! No one, of course, ever sees that shadowy flicker from the eyes of Fate that lifts one man to the peak of renown, and consigns another, equally endowed, to the multitudes of mediocrity; but without attempting to solve the riddle of Destiny, it can be truthfully related that the one tangible reason for Basil Jocelyn's great prominence was his overwhelming dread of monotony, of that state of mind called content.

That, coupled with a tremendously vital personality and an alert, keen mind had conducted him up among the feathery clouds that caress the summit of what poets call Parnassus. On his tenth birthday (he was an avid reader) his father had given him one of Richard Harding Davis's most fascinating yarns. That dated Basil's resolve to become a soldier of fortune. At that early age he had no inkling that such a trail might lead to fame; he only knew it was to be his life. He proved it by running away from agonized parents three times before he was seventeen and shipping for long voyages from strange little ports in leaky old freighters.

When the war broke, naturally, he did not wait for America. At the very first he managed, partly because of his fine linguistic ability, a commission in the French Legion. He garnered all manner of decorations there, and the finish of the struggle found him an American ace. After the war Basil Jocelyn was to be found in every land from China to Australia, wherever the egg of adventure was about to be hatched. And the world knew about it, because he wrote his experiences for eager newspapers, thus making a modest subsistence which carried him from one arena of action to another.

Then suddenly Fate flickered the well known eyelash and Basil was famous. In 20,000,000 homes the family would glance at the clock about eight, saying one to another, "Come on; let's tune in; it's time for Basil Jocelyn." Basil was so famous he had to wear a grimy cap pulled down over ears and forehead and eyes, and turn up his coat collar, whenever he walked on Broadway, for fear of being pawed about in every block by celebrity hounds.

Basil, after prudently laying away well over a $1,000,000, grew sick unto death of fame. It was to be expected that he would. One April evening, alone in his regal quarters, he felt a great rush of longing for companionship. Amazedly, Basil realized he wanted to marry. He glanced rather bitterly at a packing case in a corner of the room chock full of the month's love notes from Miss America generally.

"A fine chance," Basil murmured whimsically, "of finding a pal and a companion at home." To want was to get with Basil Jocelyn.

Thus, a month later, he was to be found in Paris wearing an old tweed suit that had lived long in the service of adventure, and sporting a mustache and building vandyke beard that rendered the Basil of countless newspaper photographs practically unrecognizable. And by day and night he frequented the real Paris that lies behind the scenes set for gaping tourists, looking—looking—always looking.

He stole along behind the quays where one may often find the stuff of dreams.

It was at Marie's that he finally found her; Marie's, tiny, spic and span and strictly Parisian. Something electric passed between them as she glanced up from her Paris edition of the Herald and their eyes met in a long gaze. Basil invited himself over to her little table. They talked and drank their aperitifs together. And they hungrily devoured Nina's delicious dinner—talking like old friends. It developed that she, like Basil, was lonely, sick of a monotonous life, and craved true companionship.

"I'll see you to your pension," Basil said, as they rose. "Funny, isn't it! I feel as if I'd known you for months; but I don't even know your name—?"

The young woman hesitated, turned a bit away from him and said.

"Oh, names! What do they matter? I'll tell you; but promise to forget it! I'm Rose Veldon!"

For the first time in his life Basil was staggered. Rose Veldon! Why, of course—that celebrated face; one of the truly worshiped queens of Hollywood.

"Well, I'll be . . . " he muttered lamely, "and I was searching for Cinderella. Oh, well! I'll own up now. I'm Jocelyn, Basil Jocelyn."

"Let's play we aren't celebs," she softly said, "and please, Basil, shave off those ridiculous whiskers so I'll know you next time."

HOW COULD MARY FIND A WAY OUT

By FANNIE HURST

(©, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service.)

THE conditions that brought about the engagement of Mary Estes to Benjamin Parke were the normal unexciting ones of a certain degree of propinquity, similarity of social standing and a general desirability smiled upon by families of both parties concerned.

In the thriving Middle West city where Mary Estes had been born and reared, Benjamin Parke was regarded as one of the most promising young business men of the community. When Mary Estes was still attending high school and taking the commercial course which was ultimately to prepare her for her work as secretary to the richest banker of the town, the Estes people were a highly respectable and conservative family in reduced finances, probably a shade or two higher in the social strata than the Parke family, although Benjamin's father was a dentist of solid standing and good practice.

The two young people of these respective and respectable families, in spite of the disparity of ten years in their ages, were thrown socially together by way of church, entertainment and bridge party. Their ultimate engagement was as normal as sunrise. A little flurry of anticipatory gossip had, of course, preceded it; its announcement was a matter of local applause; its consummation looked forward to by a group of friends and relatives who moved interestedly around the nucleus of the happy pair.

It was fun to be engaged. It was great fun to be the center of interest, the center of pleasant attention and consideration of the group of people that made up Mary's world.

The slightly envious attention of her friends who were not yet engaged, the sisterly acceptance of her as one of themselves by the girls who were engaged. The tolerant interest in her by those of her friends who were newly married. And the affectionate, busied attention from the older women—matrons, spinsters and widows alike.

All of Mary's world paid her the charming tribute that is the lot of happy young love. And she found this tribute most flattering, most attractive.

Two months after the announcement of the engagement, Mary Estes resigned her pleasant and lucrative position as secretary to the richest man in town and began preparations for a June wedding. Benjamin Parke, by then sole proprietor of a small but flourishing furniture store on High street, was known to be in the market for an attractive building lot on Kay street, one of the town's pretty bungalow districts. The friends of Mary began to plan linen showers and small festivities that had to do with the approaching marriage. Benjamin Parke took out a tidy life insurance policy and announced that he was building an ell to his furniture store.

It was an alliance that promised well. Mary and Benjamin would be a good, substantial addition to the citizenry of the community; were the kind to foster stability, decency and right living.

There was nothing in particular about the engagement of this young pair to differentiate it from alliances that were constantly being made, and yet it is possible that Mary and Ben represented what in the eyes of the community might be regarded as the ideal marriage.

The ideal marriage that would lead to years of happiness, of struggle, of accomplishments. Mistakes, of course. But on the whole the usual happy and successful life in which hardships and pleasures are mingled.

That was what made the condition so harrowing, so terrible, so secretly frightening to Mary Estes when certain menacing facts began to take on a reality she had been struggling against ever since the first few weeks following her engagement.

Everything was right, everything was as it should be. A better, steadier, more considerate boy than Benjamin Parke could not be imagined. Her parents were happy, his parents were happy, and, with a bungalow on Kay street, an old dream of her was about to come true. As Mary confided to her best chum, Alice McMahon, a pretty doll with china-blue eyes, it was a story-book engagement in its total desirability from every angle.

All except one—and that one angle Mary did not begin to admit, even to herself, until weeks after the announcement of her engagement.

Mary was not in love with Benjamin Parke. Strange, how clear the matter ultimately became to her. Not until after a long period of self-hypnosis, did Mary come to realize that, from the very beginning, she had thrown herself consciously into a state of mind about Ben. She had talked herself into a condition of seeming to be in love with him. The wish father to the thought, she had deliberately tried to force herself into a state of mind.

The engagement to Ben had been the result. It had seemed to her, during those months while the facts of her self-hypnosis still lasted, that she had accomplished right and righteousness. And then gradually, and a little horribly, it began to dawn upon her during those festive weeks of linen showers, bridge parties, evenings with Ben over blue prints of their new bungalow, that everything she was tasting was dead sea fruit.

In the dead of night, Mary would wake up with a sense of oppression in her breast, with a dread of tomorrow, with terror of what she was doing.

Mary did not love Ben. She liked him, she respected him. She even admired him. The thought of him as her husband filled her with dread.

Sometimes it seemed to Mary that to be free once more, to be free to come and go at her secretarial work, to be the girl once more unhampered and unimpeded by the dread of marriage, was the one state of being that mattered over and above anything that had ever happened. She regarded those of her girl friends who were still outside the pale of matrimony and still unhampered by ties of engagement with an envy that was as illogical as it was unlike her.

Mary had only one desire in life now—to be free. To be un-engaged. To see her life stretch before her once more filled with the old ideal of some day meeting the ultimate life companion.

To be un-engaged was out of the question. Ben took her so for granted. Her parents were in their seventh heaven of approval. His parents made no effort to conceal their pride. The community smiled. Mary was committed. Terror, rebellion, agony, panic rose within her, only to be hidden by the calm, demure exterior she showed to the world.

The day of her wedding approached and it seemed to Mary that with it there descended upon her a dread of living that must ultimately annihilate her. She knew that she must not go through with this dishonest thing of marrying Benjamin Parke.

And yet, what way out? What way out? The question beat about in Mary's tortured brain like a great, imprisoned moth. What way out?

She turned the question over and over in her hot, tired brain.

What could she do? How could she find a way out? What did other girls in the same predicament do? For surely other girls had made her mistake; though they could marry a man and then, suddenly, or gradually, realized that lack of love would make marriage intolerable.

But there was nothing to do. She couldn't do the only thing possible; tell Benjamin that she didn't love him. It would seem such a simple thing, yet it was fraught with all sorts of impossible complications. It would mean bringing hurt unhappiness to her parents and his parents. She herself would feel that she had failed—to her family, to his family—to Benjamin and to her own word. There seemed, to Mary, something dishonorable in breaking her engagement.

So what way out was there for her?

The way out came in the form of a brief note delivered to her one morning two weeks before her wedding day. It read:

"Dear Mary:

Since there is no way of telling you, without hurting you, the cruel thing which I am about to say, I shall say it in the shortest way possible. Alice McMahon and I were married at ten o'clock this morning.

(Signed) Ben."

Bringing the Medical Profession Up to Date

That the amount now paid by the average family for doctors' bills will be substantially decreased when the medical profession drops its old-fashioned ideas about advertising, and learns to adopt modern merchandising methods, is the theory advanced by Ernest Elmo Calkins, nationally known magazine writer and advertising man, writing in Medical Economics, a business magazine for doctors.

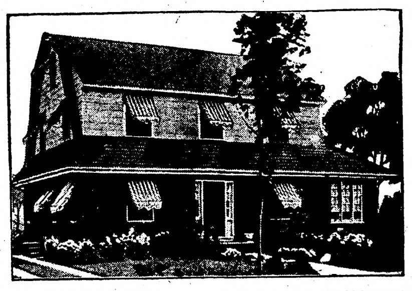
In his article "Doctors Advertise? Why not?" Mr. Calkins says, "If a program of advertising could be instituted, shared in, and supported by every doctor in the country, not only would the incomes of doctors go up, but the cost of medical attention would go down. There are hundreds of thousands who should have a doctor's care who are not getting it, thousands who could have escaped elaborate treatment or operation if taken in time. Doctors should be paid less money but by more people. The entire United States should be under the care of competent medical men. The immense store of medical knowledge now available should be utilized by more people. The way to keep well is not through ignorance and luck, but by wise advice and knowledge.

"If people understood what it meant to keep well all good doctors would be busy all the time. There is enough knowledge today of medicine and surgery to greatly improve the national health, but much of it is unavailable to large numbers of people, through ignorance, prejudice and financial limitations."

"Policeman" Fired

Uncle Sam has one silent but effective policeman who has enforced his ban on picking wildflowers and shrubs in the national parks, but so efficient has this "policeman" become that he has found it necessary to eliminate him at the camp site in Sequoia National park. The "policeman" is poison oak, which is unfamiliar to the average easterner visiting the park. So many have the cases of complaint been that the poison oak has been entirely eliminated and weed killer used to prevent its return.

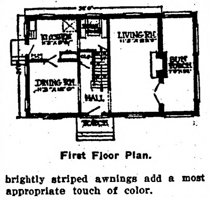
This Home of Brick and Shingles Carries an Air of Solid Worth



By W. A. RADFORD

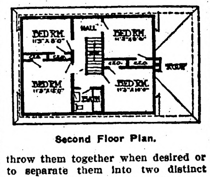
Mr. William A. Radford will answer questions and give advice FREE OF COST on all subjects pertaining to practical home building, for the readers of this paper. On account of his wide experience as editor, author and manufacturer, he is, without doubt, the highest authority on all these subjects. Address all inquiries to William A. Radford, No. 407 South Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill., and only inclose two-cent stamp for reply.

Brick and shingles have been combined in a most pleasing manner in the home illustrated here. The brick walls are carried up to the second floor line and shingles, laid wide to weather, are used on the upper walls. This home presents an appearance of solid comfort and worth, while the brightly striped awnings add a most appropriate touch of color.



First Floor Plan.

Turning to the floor plans we find a house of seven rooms, breakfast nook and sun porch. There is a central entrance hall which separates both the entrance and the stairs from all of the rooms and which contains a convenient coat closet. To one side of this hall the living room occupies the entire end of the house with the sun porch, of equal length, opening off it. The two are connected with French doors, making it possible to throw them together when desired or to separate them into two distinct rooms, when occasion requires.



Second Floor Plan.

At the opposite side of the house is the dining room with the kitchen to the rear, and just off the kitchen, to the rear of the entrance hall, is a cozy and convenient breakfast nook. There is a side service entrance opening directly into the kitchen and the latter is of the small, compact type which is demanded in modern homes.

Upstairs there are four good sized bedrooms placed in the four corners of the building. One is somewhat larger than the others and another somewhat smaller, an arrangement which is usually found most satisfactory. The bathroom is placed convenient to all these rooms and each is provided with good closet space.

Sunroom Can Be Added After House Is Built

Not many houses or apartments are built with a regular sunroom.

One is usually achieved for the winter by inclosing a porch. But, given a few essentials, it is not difficult to improvise an all-the-year-round sunroom.

If you have—say, in your living room or dining room—a bay window or group of casement windows with a southern exposure, you can transform that end of the room into a sunroom by using gayly painted wicker furniture there, placing potted plants on the window sills and adding other sunroom features of a bright, summery aspect.

The main portion of the room will still retain its appearance of living room or dining room, as the case may be; but color harmony should be maintained between that and the sunroom end. The wall space on each side of the bay window is covered with latticework, which has been painted cream or white to match the woodwork of the room. On this, vines are trained with a delightful suggestion of outdoors.

This lattice effect is repeated in the woodwork which conceals the radiator and at the same time forms an attractive window seat, on which blooming plants add to the summery aspect. The radiator cover is painted to match the rest of the woodwork.

Suppose a living room is to be decorated in a green-and-brown color scheme, with brightening touches of orange. The walls and woodwork are painted cream. The wicker furniture at the sunroom end is painted light green and cushioned with cretonne in which orange, peacock blue and brown are blended on a cream ground. Window drapes and lampshides are of plain, orange silk.

In a dining room with walls painted a light rose and woodwork white, paint the wicker furniture at the sunroom end a deeper rose and cushion the chairs with cretonne, having a design in rose, green and black on a white ground.

Beauty of Face Brick Imperishable on Home

Colorful face brick make your new house a real home—substantial, comfortable, satisfying—one that will serve you a lifetime and pass down to your children's children, lovely with the mellowness of the years, precious with the cherished memories of family fireside and genial friends.

In the wide range of attractive face brick colors and textures you will find just the right tones to suit your particular house and your own individaul tastes.

Durable, comfortable through all the seasons, safe from fire, slow to depreciate, with low insurance rates and smaller fuel bills, freedom from repair and painting costs, your face brick home will in the long run cost no more than the house built of less enduring materials.

Wooden Picket Fence Is Staging Come-Back

Remember the old wooden picket fence that used to enclose thousands of square miles of American front lawns from Bangor, Maine, to San Diego? It began disappearing along with the horse and the wood-burning stove about twenty years ago. Today it is almost non-existant. But it is coming back.

The difference is that while the old fence was built chiefly for protection—to mark the owner's premises and keep out the neighbor's dogs and other wandering creatures in a day when American cities were new—the modern fence is being built for beauty's sake, says the Home and Field magazine.

Americans with a feeling for beauty are coming to realize that long stretches of unbroken and unadorned front lawns open to the street are almost as unattractive as the unending miles of uniform picket fences in the old days, points out G. K. Geerlings, the writer, an authority on landscape gardening. The average residential district, costly though its homes may be, presents a general effect of monotony. And that, thinks Mr. Geerlings, is because the householder is content with a front lawn, well-kept perhaps and adorned with an occasional tree or shrub, but lacking individual distinction.

The enclosed front yard, laid out in a garden and walks with an ivy-covered house in the background, expresses the owner's personality as mere architecture never can. The fact that each person's taste is different from his neighbor's would make such a street one of varied interest instead of uniform regularity.

That is why the enclosure is coming back, either as a simple picket affair, but different from its neighbors; as a low stone wall surmounted by pickets; as a fence composed of interesting panels of pickets, or as a stone wall high enough to shut off the view except from the entryways.

Sush distinction is not only beautiful but profitable, says the Home and Field writer. Homes with well-designed grounds bring far higher prices than those that face on a bare and uninteresting landscape.

Close-Grained Woods Need No Crack Filler

Floors with close grain surfaces such as maple, pine, birch and fir need no filler. For a natural finish, just apply a clear floor lacquer after the sanding is done, and later add two coats of paste wax. A lacquer wood stain of any color may be used instead and followed by waxing.

Inglenooks

Built-in inglenooks may be installed in any corner of the home living room, library, sun porch or hall, where a recess is formed either by chimneys or by bay windows extending beyond the normal outline of the room.

"Warm" Corpse Too Much for Nerves of Ghouls

About one hundred years ago a gentleman, well known for the mad pranks in which he delighted, was walking past a lonely kirkyard in Midlothian when he saw a well-appointed horse and trap standing unattended before the gate. Curious to know what this might mean, he crouched in the ditch by the wall and waited.

In a few moments two men came out of the kirkyard carrying in a sack a long object which they propped up on end on the seat next to the driver's. Then they said something about tools and went back. Quick as thought the watcher pulled down the sack, emptied its grisly contents into the ditch, climbed into the trap, got into the sack, and braced himself stiffly into position.

Hardly had he done so when the two men returned and threw some tools into the trap, after which one got up in front and the other on the back seat. "Wud" as he was, our adventurer now began to repent of his hastiness, reflecting that one corpse was as good as another on the dissecting table, where, in those days, questions were by no means always asked. Suddenly the driver turned to his mate, and in accents of crawling horror gasped, "Mon, Jamie, the corp's warm!" The "corp" had presence of mind enough to moan in a hollow tone, "We're all warm where I come from."

There were two wild yells, the springs of the trap bounced furiously, the horse broke into a gallop, and when he got out of his sack the gentleman found himself alone, heading for Edinburgh at a great pace. The horse, trap, harness and tools served him well for many years and no one ever claimed them.—Edinburgh Scotsman.

Immortal "Will's" Father Feared Process Servers

Prosecution of Councillor Cox, of Manchester, for not attending church on Sunday, was founded on the Sunday Observance act of 1677. But the law of England about compulsory church observance was the same a hundred years earlier, when Shakespeare's father was reported to the Stratford authorities "for not comminge monethlie to Churche accordinge to hir Majesties lawes."

But it was not lack of piety so much as lack of pelf that kept John Shakespeare away from the parish church. For in the record, there is this note appended to his name and the names of eight other offenders: "It is sayde that these laste nine coom not to Church for feare of process for debtte."

It was on September 25, 1592, that this record was made—just a year before the publication of "Venus and Adonis," described by Shakespeare in his dedication as "The first heire of my invention."—London Morning Post.

Gallant Indeed

The Grand Duke Boris contended, at a Hollywood charity sale, that the American man surpasses all others in gallantry and wit.

"And I just overheard a conversation," said the grand duke, "that bears me out.

"That pretty girl over there selling toys said to a young man who stopped to admire her booth:

"'What do you think of my scheme of decoration—holly leaves and berries over laurel?'

"'Well, to be frank,' said the young man, 'I'd much prefer mistletoe over yew.'"

Prehistoric Mining

Evidences that man had reached a well-developed stage of mining activity even when mastodons and other prehistoric animals roamed the earth have been found through reports of the discovery of a series of ancient mine workings in Natal, South Africa. The character of the mine workings, as reported to Assistant Trade Commissioner DuWayne Clark at Johannesburg, indicates that they were being operated before the arrival of the Zulu nations in South Africa.

Farm Land Figures

The most valuable farm land in the United States, per average acre, is in Florida, where it has increased 77 per cent in value since 1915. The cheapest land, according to Collier's Weekly, is in Montana, where it has decreased 28 per cent during this same period.

Unhappy Wives

HUSBANDS frequently neglect their health—become "run-down" and irritable. You who love him best of all, are usually first to note when he looks and acts older than his years.

Don't merely be unhappy about his health. Help him to new strength and vitality by giving him Fellows' Syrup. For men, and women too, it promptly improves appetite. It banishes "nerves." It aids in rekindling new interest in living. This wonderful tonic is famous 'round the world, as Nature's assistant in building up weakened systems. Most likely your own doctor is among the many thousands of physicians who regularly prescribe it. Get genuine Fellows' Syrup at your druggist's.

Firmly Planted

An East side resident had carefully prepared the soil preparatory to setting out some very choice rose bushes in his yard. He mixed the soil thoroughly with what he presumed to be fertilizer, watered the roots and took great precautions in order that the roses would have every advantage. But despite his care, within an unusually short time, the roses withered and died. Eager to know the cause of their death he went out to investigate. He took his spade and attempted to loosen the soil about them, but much to his surprise and disgust discovered that instead of fertilizing the roses, he had by mistake used cement and placed his roses in a concrete base.—Indianapolis News.

WOMEN AND PINEAPPLES

WHEN women make a study of women in industry, the results are sometimes interesting to women in the home, as well as to women with jobs. This is especially so when the industry investigated is work on food in commercial kitchens. Then questions leap to the lips. "Are the kitchens clean?" "Is the food wholesome and immaculately handled?" "Is the working environment all that it should be?"

Immaculately Clean

The Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor recently turned its attention to the answers to these and many other questions in regard to Hawaii's second largest industry, the canning of pineapples. The results of this investigation, published in pamphlet form, showed that not one of the cannery buildings visited was old. Those most recently built were high, light and airy, and as spotless as your own kitchen. All were adequately drained.

"Conspicuous to anyone visiting the canneries even casually," says a review of this report by Jean Collier Brown in "Practical Home Economics," "would be the uniforms worn by the girls at work, generally furnished and laundered by the firm. It was reported that upon the deposit of a soiled apron the matron in charge gave out a clean one, the exchange being made at any hour of the day and as often as necessary. Everywhere the employees wore rubber gloves, which added to the general sanitary effect."

All of which is very satisfactory, but the woman in the home wants also to know the best ways to serve this fruit which has been found by the government investigators to be so carefully and wholesomely handled. So here are some of the latest recipes which have been evolved for its use:

Orange Flower Salad: Drain one 8-ounce can of pineapple tidbits, add one-half cup diced celery and marinate in French dressing for an hour. Add one-fourth cup chopped walnuts and pile in mounds in the center of lettuce leaves. Remove sections from two oranges, leaving on none of the white fibre, and arrange star fashion over the mound of fruit. On top radiate a date cut in strips. Serve with cream mayonnaise. This serves four persons.

Pineapple Pistachio Rice: Beat one cup heavy cream and fold into two cups of cold boiled rice. Add two cups crushed pineapple, one-fourth cup confectioner's sugar, one-half cup chopped pistachio nuts, and chill. Serve in glass dessert dishes with a teaspoon of orange marmalade on top for garnish. This serves eight persons.

Chocolate Pineapple Slices: Melt four squares of chocolate in a double boiler, add one-third cup peanut butter and stir until well-blended. Add three-fourths cup confectioner's sugar and three-fourths cup evaporated milk, and cook until thick. Drain eight slices of pineapple and dip each one in the chocolate until well coated. Place one slice on each small service plate and sprinkle with salted peanuts. Place a marshmallow in the center of each.

Still More Treats

Pineapple Charlotte: Remove crusts from eight slices of bread and spread with butter. Heat the contents of a No. 2 can of crushed pineapple and one-fourth cup of sugar to boiling. Put layers of the buttered bread and the hot pineapple in a rather deep dish and press down well. Let stand several hours in the refrigerator; then turn out in mold form and serve cut in slices. Garnish with whipped cream and maraschino cherries. This serves eight persons.

Baked Pineapple and Rhubarb: Cut six cups rhubarb, unpeeled, in small pieces. Put in a baking dish with one cup sugar, ten cloves, one-eighth teaspoon cinnamon and one cup pineapple syrup. Cover and bake until tender, in an oven, 375 degrees. Serve cold with some simple cake, such as sponge cake. This serves eight persons.*

Giant Fish Caught

A giant muskelunge weighing a few ounces over fifty-five pounds and measuring fifty-three inches in length, was caught by J. W. Collins near the Bill Coutts camp on Saboscong Bay, Lake of the Woods, Friday. It was the biggest muskie ever brought to Baudette and it attracted a lot of attention at Mr. Collin's store. Jack has had the fish sent to Duluth to be mounted, and he has also entered it in the Field and Stream competition where it is practically certain to win the national champinship.

The largest muskie ever before caught any place is said to have weighed fifty-three and a half pounds, so that Mr. Collins' catch is the world's champion muskie of all time.

Mr. Coutts' handling of the canoe while Jack was engaged in the battle with the muskie was superb, and had a lot to do with him finally landing the giant fish.

Muskies weighing 45 pounds are not so uncommon in the lake, and one weighing 52 pounds was caught last summer, but this is the first time a 55-pounder has been hooked. The big fellow gave Mr. Collins a real fight, and it required more than an hour to land him. In company with Harry Johnson and Mr. Coutts, Mr. Collins left the Coutts camp Friday morning, and it was not long afterward when the muskie took the lure. Then ensued "the battle of the century." The fish was towed about a mile to tire him out, but he still had plenty of fight left in him, and he practically wrecked Collins' reel as he was brought into the boat. Several times muskies from the Lake of the Woods have won the national championship, and this year, with Mr. Collins' big fellow, the lake is almost sure to repeat, as the muskie caught Friday is bigger than any of the previous champions. Lake of the Woods is sure to get much favorable advertising as a result of the big catch.—Baudette Region.

Why Have Cow-Testing Associations?

They offer records necessary to:

1. Intelligently breed and develop Dairy Cows.
2. Maintain and increase herd profits and efficiency.
3. Prove bulls by dam and daughter comparison.
4. Eliminate the cow of low producing ability.
5. Select dams from which calves will be worth raising.
6. Feed good cows at the lowest cost per pound of butterfat.
7. Make possible the fitting of supply and market demand.
8. Adjust the feed requirements of the herd to the crop produced.
9. Provide an incentive to the herd owner to do better work.
10. Offer training in and show possibilities of co-operation.

Thief Lake Dam

The restoration of Thief Lake, once a paradise for duck hunters from far and wide, and hailed as the largest project of its kind in the nation, finally has been realized with the placing of one of the 17½ foot center concrete sections of the 70 foot dam at the outlet of the lake, it has been announced by attorney W. E. Rowe.

Mr. Rowe is a special representative of the state game and fish department in the project. Engineers and workers of the Peterson Bros. Construction Co., of Montevideo, Minn., are now putting on the finishing touches to complete the dam which was started last year.

The dam which is located at the mouth of the Thief River which starts from Thief Lake will dam up the waters drained into the lake bed ditch and the lake from territory drained by ditches flowing into the area. It si expected that the lake will eventually be raised to a point higher than its old natural level. The dream of the younger generation of duck hunters and memories of the older generation may become true, if predictions of the boosters for the project come true. Fish formerly abounding in these waters, may again become numerous, it is declared.

It is the intention of the state game and fish department engineers to raise the water level in the lake to a point 1160 feet above sea level with a possibility that it may later be raised to a level of 1163 feet.

In its natural state, before being drained, Thief Lake comprised 7,050 acres of land. The new lake area will be approximately 12,000 acres, Mr. Rowe states. Approximately 19,000 acres were purchased by the state game and fish department through condemnation proceedings.

Considerable legal detail work to close up the condemnation proceedings, reports and awards to land owners remain to be finished, said Mr. Rowe, and it will not be for several weeks that this part of the project will be finished.—Crookston Leader.

Miss Thilda Ness daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Nils Ness was taken suddenly ill on Wednesday and Dr. Berge of Thief River was called to attend to her case.

Nohre-Horien

A pretty wedding occured Wednesday, August 5, when Hilma Nohre and Edgar Horien exchanged nuptial vows at 10.30 a. m. at the Nazareth Lutheran Church, with Rev. Redal reading the service.

Bridal attendants were Miss Agnes Nohre and Elmer Nohre, sister and brother of the bride. Lois Hanson acted as flower girl and Stanley Haukeness as ring bearer.

The bridal party entered to the strains of theLohengrin wedding march, played by Gladys Sanoden. The bride was given away at the altar by her father. The double ring ceremony was used.

The bride was attired in a white georgette and silk lace dress with a veil fastened with orange blossoms. She carried a bouquet of gladiolas. The bridesmaid wore an orchid colored flat crepe dress with an embroidered jacket effect over the lace top. She carried a bouquet of carnations and daisies. The groom and the best man were attired in dark blue suits. The ringbearer wore a white suit, and carried the rings on a white pillow. The flower girl wore a ruffled orchid dress and carried sweetpeas and snapdragons.

Following the ceremony a reception banquet was served to about thirty people at the bride's home.

Mrs. Horien is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Nohre, and Mr. Horien is a son of Mrs. Ed. Horien. all well-known in this community. They will make their home on a farm northeast of Holt.

The News joins their many friends in extending the best of wishes to the newlyweds.

Dr. Berge of Thief River was a caller at the Olaf Hagen home on Monday afternoon.

Alfred Sollom of Bagley in company with a representative of the Federal Land Department at Washington was here Wednesday looking over the old homestead of Mr. Sollom in Mud Lake in the interest of getting thru a claim for improvements which Sollom had made on it prior to the time the government took it back from the homesteaders a few years ago.

Creamery Burns

The Farmers' Co-operative Creamery at Karlstad was destroyed by fire on Monday of last week. They have already started up business again by taking in the cream and cooling it at Karlstad and hauling it over to Greenbush by truck where it is churned into Karlstad butter so the creamery can continue its identity.

The loss will be well above the $5,000 mark, and $2,000 was carried in insurance, it will be a hard blow to the patrons at this time.

Farmers Set Harvest Wages

According to an item in the Kennedy Star about 300 farmers met up at Hallock on July 29th to discuss harvest wages. The schedule was set as follows: for shocking 15 cents per hour, or $1.50 per day; for threshing, 20 cents per hour, or $2.00 per day. $1.00 a day will be paid for team and wagon.

Farmers that took part in the discussion recalled the time in the early nineties when grain was selling at comparable prices with those now prevailing. Harvest wages nearly forty years ago ranged from $1.00 to $2.00 per day according to several of the old timers.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson and three children spent Tuesday at the Leo Horien home.

Born to Mrs. Gilbert Johnsom on Tuesday a girl.

WOMEN AND PINEAPPLES

WHEN women make a study of women in industry, the results are sometimes interesting to women in the home, as well as to women with jobs. This is especially so when the industry investigated is work on food in commercial kitchens. Then questions leap to the lips. "Are the kitchens clean?" "Is the food wholesome and immaculately handled?" "Is the working environment all that it should be?"

Immaculately Clean

The Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor recently turned its attention to the answers to these and many other questions in regard to Hawaii's second largest industry, the canning of pineapples. The results of this investigation, published in pamphlet form, showed that not one of the cannery buildings visited was old. Those most recently built were high, light and airy, and as spotless as your own kitchen. All were adequately drained.

"Conspicuous to anyone visiting the canneries even casually," says a review of this report by Jean Collier Brown in "Practical Home Economics," "would be the uniforms worn by the girls at work, generally furnished and laundered by the firm. It was reported that upon the deposit of a soiled apron the matron in charge gave out a clean one, the exchange being made at any hour of the day and as often as necessary. Everywhere the employees wore rubber gloves, which added to the general sanitary effect."

All of which is very satisfactory, but the woman in the home wants also to know the best ways to serve this fruit which has been found by the government investigators to be so carefully and wholesomely handled. So here are some of the latest recipes which have been evolved for its use:

Orange Flower Salad: Drain one 8-ounce can of pineapple tidbits, add one-half cup diced celery and marinate in French dressing for an hour. Add one-fourth cup chopped walnuts and pile in mounds in the center of lettuce leaves. Remove sections from two oranges, leaving on none of the white fibre, and arrange star fashion over the mound of fruit. On top radiate a date cut in strips. Serve with cream mayonnaise. This serves four persons.

Pineapple Pistachio Rice: Beat one cup heavy cream and fold into two cups of cold boiled rice. Add two cups crushed pineapple, one-fourth cup confectioner's sugar, one-half cup chopped pistachio nuts, and chill. Serve in glass dessert dishes with a teaspoon of orange marmalade on top for garnish. This serves eight persons.

Chocolate Pineapple Slices: Melt four squares of chocolate in a double boiler, add one-third cup peanut butter and stir until well-blended. Add three-fourths cup confectioner's sugar and three-fourths cup evaporated milk, and cook until thick. Drain eight slices of pineapple and dip each one in the chocolate until well coated. Place one slice on each small service plate and sprinkle with salted peanuts. Place a marshmallow in the center of each.

Still More Treats

Pineapple Charlotte: Remove crusts from eight slices of bread and spread with butter. Heat the contents of a No. 2 can of crushed pineapple and one-fourth cup of sugar to boiling. Put layers of the buttered bread and the hot pineapple in a rather deep dish and press down well. Let stand several hours in the refrigerator; then turn out in mold form and serve cut in slices. Garnish with whipped cream and maraschino cherries. This serves eight persons.

Baked Pineapple and Rhubarb: Cut six cups rhubarb, unpeeled, in small pieces. Put in a baking dish with one cup sugar, ten cloves, one-eighth teaspoon cinnamon and one cup pineapple syrup. Cover and bake until tender, in an oven, 375 degrees. Serve cold with some simple cake, such as sponge cake. This serves eight persons.*

Giant Fish Caught

A giant muskelunge weighing a few ounces over fifty-five pounds and measuring fifty-three inches in length, was caught by J. W. Collins near the Bill Coutts camp on Saboscong Bay, Lake of the Woods, Friday. It was the biggest muskie ever brought to Baudette and it attracted a lot of attention at Mr. Collin's store. Jack has had the fish sent to Duluth to be mounted, and he has also entered it in the Field and Stream competition where it is practically certain to win the national champinship.

The largest muskie ever before caught any place is said to have weighed fifty-three and a half pounds, so that Mr. Collins' catch is the world's champion muskie of all time.

Mr. Coutts' handling of the canoe while Jack was engaged in the battle with the muskie was superb, and had a lot to do with him finally landing the giant fish.

Muskies weighing 45 pounds are not so uncommon in the lake, and one weighing 52 pounds was caught last summer, but this is the first time a 55-pounder has been hooked. The big fellow gave Mr. Collins a real fight, and it required more than an hour to land him. In company with Harry Johnson and Mr. Coutts, Mr. Collins left the Coutts camp Friday morning, and it was not long afterward when the muskie took the lure. Then ensued "the battle of the century." The fish was towed about a mile to tire him out, but he still had plenty of fight left in him, and he practically wrecked Collins' reel as he was brought into the boat. Several times muskies from the Lake of the Woods have won the national championship, and this year, with Mr. Collins' big fellow, the lake is almost sure to repeat, as the muskie caught Friday is bigger than any of the previous champions. Lake of the Woods is sure to get much favorable advertising as a result of the big catch.—Baudette Region.

All the children were home and they were: B. C. Heinze of Beresford, S. Dak.; Mrs. F. J. McKinley, Minneapolis; Mrs. A. C. Israelson and Mrs. A. J. Higgins of Bronson; Mrs. W. Fluke Holt and Alice at home.

Why Have Cow-Testing Associations?

They offer records necessary to:

1. Intelligently breed and develop Dairy Cows.
2. Maintain and increase herd profits and efficiency.
3. Prove bulls by dam and daughter comparison.
4. Eliminate the cow of low producing ability.
5. Select dams from which calves will be worth raising.
6. Feed good cows at the lowest cost per pound of butterfat.
7. Make possible the fitting of supply and market demand.
8. Adjust the feed requirements of the herd to the crop produced.
9. Provide an incentive to the herd owner to do better work.
10. Offer training in and show possibilities of co-operation.

Thief Lake Dam

The restoration of Thief Lake, once a paradise for duck hunters from far and wide, and hailed as the largest project of its kind in the nation, finally has been realized with the placing of one of the 17½ foot center concrete sections of the 70 foot dam at the outlet of the lake, it has been announced by attorney W. E. Rowe.

Mr. Rowe is a special representative of the state game and fish department in the project. Engineers and workers of the Peterson Bros. Construction Co., of Montevideo, Minn., are now putting on the finishing touches to complete the dam which was started last year.

The dam which is located at the mouth of the Thief River which starts from Thief Lake will dam up the waters drained into the lake bed ditch and the lake from territory drained by ditches flowing into the area. It si expected that the lake will eventually be raised to a point higher than its old natural level. The dream of the younger generation of duck hunters and memories of the older generation may become true, if predictions of the boosters for the project come true. Fish formerly abounding in these waters, may again become numerous, it is declared.

It is the intention of the state game and fish department engineers to raise the water level in the lake to a point 1160 feet above sea level with a possibility that it may later be raised to a level of 1163 feet.

In its natural state, before being drained, Thief Lake comprised 7,050 acres of land. The new lake area will be approximately 12,000 acres, Mr. Rowe states. Approximately 19,000 acres were purchased by the state game and fish department through condemnation proceedings.

Considerable legal detail work to close up the condemnation proceedings, reports and awards to land owners remain to be finished, said Mr. Rowe, and it will not be for several weeks that this part of the project will be finished.—Crookston Leader.

Miss Thilda Ness daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Nils Ness was taken suddenly ill on Wednesday and Dr. Berge of Thief River was called to attend to her case.

Nohre-Horien

A pretty wedding occured Wednesday, August 5, when Hilma Nohre and Edgar Horien exchanged nuptial vows at 10.30 a. m. at the Nazareth Lutheran Church, with Rev. Redal reading the service.

Bridal attendants were Miss Agnes Nohre and Elmer Nohre, sister and brother of the bride. Lois Hanson acted as flower girl and Stanley Haukeness as ring bearer.

The bridal party entered to the strains of the Lohengrin wedding march, played by Gladys Sanoden. The bride was given away at the altar by her father. The double ring ceremony was used.

The bride was attired in a white georgette and silk lace dress with a veil fastened with orange blossoms. She carried a bouquet of gladiolas. The bridesmaid wore an orchid colored flat crepe dress with an embroidered jacket effect over the lace top. She carried a bouquet of carnations and daisies. The groom and the best man were attired in dark blue suits. The ringbearer wore a white suit, and carried the rings on a white pillow. The flower girl wore a ruffled orchid dress and carried sweetpeas and snapdragons.

Following the ceremony a reception banquet was served to about thirty people at the bride's home.

Mrs. Horien is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Nohre, and Mr. Horien is a son of Mrs. Ed. Horien, all well-known in this community. They will make their home on a farm northeast of Holt.

The News joins their many friends in extending the best of wishes to the newlyweds.

Dr. Berge of Thief River was a caller at the Olaf Hagen home on Monday afternoon.

Alfred Sollom of Bagley in company with a representative of the Federal Land Department at Washington was here Wednesday looking over the old homestead of Mr. Sollom in Mud Lake in the interest of getting thru a claim for improvements which Sollom had made on it prior to the time the government took it back from the homesteaders a few years ago.

Creamery Burns

The Farmers' Co-operative Creamery at Karlstad was destroyed by fire on Monday of last week. They have already started up business again by taking in the cream and cooling it at Karlstad and hauling it over to Greenbush by truck where it is churned into Karlstad butter so the creamery can continue its identity.

The loss will be well above the $5,000 mark, and $2,000 was carried in insurance, it will be a hard blow to the patrons at this time.

Farmers Set Harvest Wages

According to an item in the Kennedy Star about 300 farmers met up at Hallock on July 29th to discuss harvest wages. The schedule was set as follows: for shocking 15 cents per hour, or $1.50 per day; for threshing, 20 cents per hour, or $2.00 per day. $1.00 a day will be paid for team and wagon.

Farmers that took part in the discussion recalled the time in the early nineties when grain was selling at comparable prices with those now prevailing. Harvest wages nearly forty years ago ranged from $1.00 to $2.00 per day according to several of the old timers.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson and three children spent Tuesday at the Leo Horien home.

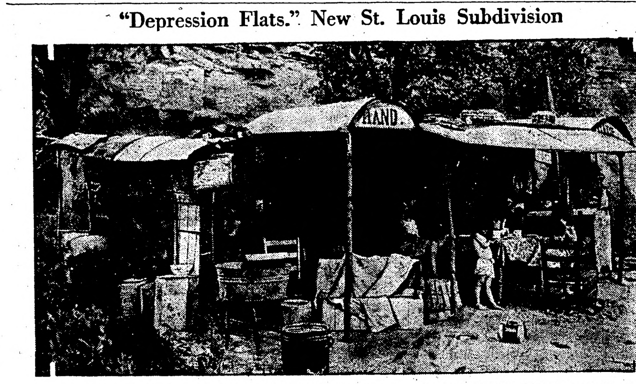
"Depression Flats." New St. Louis Subdivision



For about a mile along the Mississippi at St. Louis may be seen many small make-shift shacks built of old boards and tar paper. This is the new subdivision built and occupied by those families and individuals who are without jobs and funds and named "Depression Flats." These people have taken the liberty, under their circumstances, to squat on the edge of the Mississippi where living is cheaper and children can romp and play. The photograph shows one of the shacks where a family of six, including three children, make their home.

Plan to Take Gold From Sea Fails

Berlin.—The fantastic scheme of German scientists to pay Germany's reparation debt with gold from the ocean has been abandoned.

For more than eight years Professor Wilhelm Schlenk of the chemical institute of the Berlin university revealed, German scientists carried on extensive research in all the oceans of the world in an attempt to extract gold from seawater.

Hope Is Abandoned.

"Our last hope of winning gold from sources other than mines has been definitely abandoned," Professor Schlenk declared to Universal Service.

"The idea of extracting gold from the ocean sprang up during the inflation period when the gold question was so burning. A number of ships equipped with the latest scientific instruments and modern laboratories carried Germany's most prominent scientists to all corners of the world.

"According to Arrenius, the percentage of gold in the ocean would have been adequate to warrant extracting it. But our expeditions found that Arrenius was wrong and that only a small fraction of the amount of gold he claimed to have found in ocean water actually existed.

Hard to Extract.

"But even if Arrenius had been right, it would be practically impossible to isolate the precious metal, owing to its extremely irregular distribution. Contrary to general belief, ocean water is not a specific solution, but a continually changing mixture.

"Water from the polar regions contains an entirely different percentage of salt, chemicals and minerals than water from the tropics.

"And gold's peculiar molecular formations in ocean water offer an added difficulty in extracting it. We found veritable 'gold streams,' specific currents which contain a higher percentage of gold."

Immigration Tide to United States at Ebb

Washington.—Fewer immigrants are now being admitted than at any time during the last 100 years, and immigration has ceased to be "an economic menace," William N. Doak, secretary of labor, has announced.

Only one immigrant is entering the United States where five were admitted a year ago and thirty in 1914, Mr. Doak declared. Swelling the outward time of migration, there were more than 18,000 aliens deported in the fiscal year just ended on June 30, he said.

Mr. Doak recommended that congress raise the educational requirements for admission to citizenship. Too many persons are gaining citizenship who do not comprehend its responsibilities, he said, also significant in its declaration that "there are now signs of improvement in employment conditions."

Old Court Records Complete Archives

St. Louis, Mo.—Three packing boxes of old official court records of Ste. Genevieve, Mo., shipped recently to the Missouri Historical society, has given that body complete official records from that district between 1761 and 1865—almost 100 years.

Previously the society had been given official papers from 1761 to 1804. Recently, however, it was decided to turn papers dating from 1804 to 1865 over to the society.

Owl "Hypnotizes" Man; Claws Out One of Eyes

Edmonton, Alta.—"Hypnotized" by a vicious mother owl, which clawed his face and body, Albert Hughes of Wainwright, Alta., was at a hospital here after an operation for removal of his right eye.

"I was walking underneath a tree," said Hughes, "when the owl suddenly fluttered from her nest. I didn't fight back or run. I couldn't. All I could see was those two big eyes. I was hypnotized."

Asked If He Wants to Go to Jail, Mute Says "No"

Seattle.—William Leonard, twenty-three, was taken to Police court, charged with begging. He professed to be deaf and dumb. Court attaches tried various ruses, attempting to make him talk, but all failed until Judge John B. Gordon suddenly caught his eye and asked, "Do you want to go to jail?" Leonard quickly replied "No." He was escorted to a cell.

Lipstick Once Classed With Witchcraft Art

London.—Use of lipstick was once a punishable offense in England, according to Dr. Margaret Fishenden, scientific investigator in the department of scientific and industrial research.

Cosmetics were introduced into England by the knight crusaders, she declared in a radio broadcast on "Chemistry and the Housewife."

In 1780, she said, it was decreed that any woman who should "seduce, or betray into matrimony any of his majesty's subjects by scents, paints or cosmetic washes should incur the penalty of the law in force against witchcraft and that the marriage, upon conviction, should stand null and void."

More German Food Served in Paris Cafes

Paris.—The ever increasing number of Germans frequenting Montmartre and Montparnasse, the two gayest night haunts of Paris, has caused restaurateurs and cafe proprietors to substitute German dishes for American ones served as specialties.

In former years the restaurant men catered to Americans with breakfast foods, "hot dogs" and baked beans. The decrease in Americans has resulted in the appearance of German dainties.

College Boy Orchestras to Play on U. S. Liners

Boston.—Collegians will be employed to play in the orchestras of ships of the United States lines during the summer months, according to plans being completed by the Intercollegiate Alumni extension service.

Orchestras from the following colleges have already been engaged for the summer: University of Pennsylvania, University of California, Massachusetts Institute of Technology Penn States, Ohio State, Columbia, Fordham, and University of Maryland.

Petrified Rattlesnake Found on Mountain

Westfield, Mass.—Evidence of what may have been a prehistoric rattlesnake has been found on Mount Teko.

The apparently petrified reptile appears on the face of a cliff a score of feet from the nearest footpath. Scientists who have viewed it estimate that it was about seven feet long and four inches in diameter.

Gen. Washington Knew Pinch of "Hard Times"

Washington.—George Washington arrived at his home from the Revolutionary war practically "broke," recent letters reveal.

He sent his mother 15 guineas with the explanation that these were all he had and that they were due some one else.

"I now have demands upon me for more than £500, 340-odd of which is due for the tax of 1786, and I know not where or when I shall receive one shilling with which to pay it."

School to Recess So the Pupils Can Dig Potatoes

Bethlehem, Pa.—The Moore township district in Northampton county planned a school schedule to include a two weeks recess during the potato digging season. According to the plan the schools will be opened on August 24, two weeks earlier than usual. When the potato season arrives the directors will close the schools for the two week period to permit children to assist at their homes in digging the potatoes.

Motorist Arrested When He Offers Chief a "Hip"

Quincy, Mass.—Frank Farrell was motoring through Cohasset when he stopped his car to ask a pedestrian for a match. A girl companion of Farrell offered the stranger a drink. The stranger, who proved to be Police Chief H. J. Pelletier, arrested Farrell. In court Farrell was fined $100 for drunken driving.

Eagle Believed to Have Attacked Child Killed

Tazewell, Va.—John Murray, a farmer, killed an eagle at Horsepen that had a spread of 78 inches from tip to tip. It is believed that it was the same eagle that attacked a child recently. The bird was found drinking from a creek when shot.

LIFE'S LITTLE JESTS

KNEW THE TRICKS

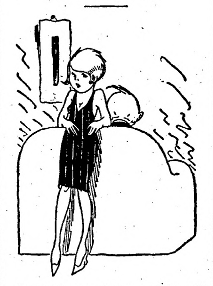
"You know, mum," said little Hector, "dad must have been up to all sorts of mischief when he was a boy like me."

"What makes you think so, my son?" asked his mother.

Hector looked very thoughful.

"Well," he went on, "he always knows exactly what questions to ask me when he wants to know where I'm going and what I've been doing."

ONE OMISSION



"I asked your father and he said you were old enough to know your own mind."

"He didn't tell you how old I was, did he?"

Out of Order

Mrs. Murphy—I've just asked Mrs. Smith 'ow 'er ole man't gettin' on, and orl 'er sed wuz. "'E's out of order." Does 'er mean 'e's bad?

Mrs. Jones—No, 'e ain't bad. 'Er's 'ad that sayin' orf them broken slot misheens. It's swank, an' means that 'e won't work.—London Answers.

A Little Hint

Smith—What are you cutting out of the paper?

Jones—A report of a man who got a divorce because his wife went through his pockets.

Smith—What are you going to do with it?"

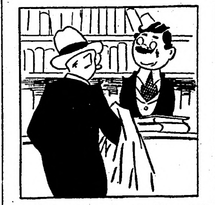
Jones—Put it in my pocket."

A Bad Spirit

Count Felix von Luckner, famous "sea raider" of the German navy, ended a toast at a banquet in New York with the words:

"The nautical spirit in many a country is like the wife in many a marriage—a helpmate first, afterwards a checkmate."

MATCHED HER DRESS



Ryters Kramp—I saw Miss Millyuns buying my new book yesterday.

Clerk—Yes, she said the color of the binding just matched her new lounging robe.

Such Paper Is Warming

Professor—Science has discovered that paper can be used effectively to keep a person warm.

Farmer—Yes, I gave a 30-day note once and it kept me in a sweat for a month.—Capper's Weekly.

The Haven

First Clubman—After all, if it wasn't for our wives, would either of us be where we are now?

Second Clubman—Quite right. Isn't that what clubs are for?—The Humorist.

Atmosphere

"I think they might strain the orange peel from this orange marmalate."

"That is put in as a guarantee of good faith."

Policies

"Have you outlined your policy to your constituents?"

"No," replied Senator Sorghum; "I am still looking over the policies my constituents have outlined to me, trying to decide on which I had better select."

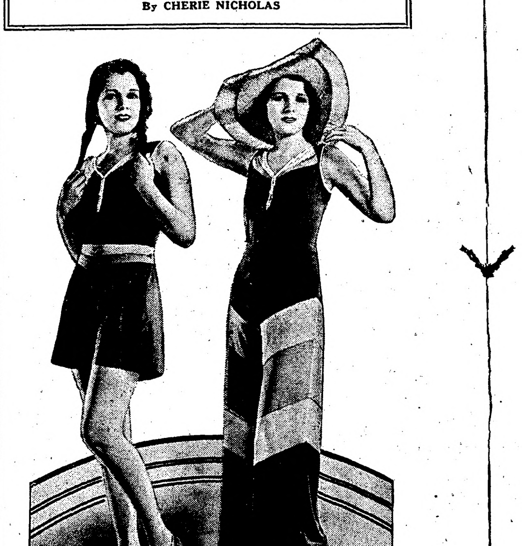
An Easy Matter

Poet—Your father says I ought to have $50,000 before I marry you.

She—Well, dear, I can wait a few months.—Pathfinder.

Combination for Beach and Water

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



IS YOUR vacation program mostly a matter of swimming, bathing and sunning? If so, you will be interested in the combination bathing and beach costume, shown in the picture. It might correctly be spoken of as a three-in-one proposition, for it is all of that—a sun, water and sand costume.

As to "looks," well, you can see for yourself that it is about as smart a costume as ever went in the water or ever came out for a stroll on the beach. As to being practical, that is exactly why we are illustrating it here, because it is thoroughly so.

See to the left this modish suit all ready to jump in and take a swim. Of course, not even a bathing costume is expected to stay under the water all the time, especially when the call of the beach style-parade is so insistent. When it comes to beach regalia, as every woman knows, it is huge hats and novel pajamas which are telling most of the story. Wherefore, it's a wise designer who included in this ensemble perfectly stunning pajamas with a straw hat as gaily colorful as the mode demands.

You will adore the chic color scheme of the snug-fitting pajamas which belong to this ensemble and which are therefore made of the same skipper blue jersey as the shorts and bodice. Which reminds us of the fact that jersey is more popular than ever for bathing and beach costumes. But about the stripes which distinguish these pajamas and which we started to tell about, they play up algerian red, legionaire blue and morocco sand—French colonial colors, if you please, which are so highly in vogue at the moment.

Now that designers have taken to creating the many-piece costume, which is true both as to formal and informal modes, the trend is especially made a feature in the realm of bathing and beach togs. One of the newest ideas in this direction is the three-piece which includes a wrap-around skirt which by a mere gesture on the part of the wearer can be converted into a serviceable and charming beach cape.

Clever looking beach sets which are as gaudily colorful as any bathing beauty might wish are made of terry cloth, the trio consisting of a long practical coat, a wide-brimmed hat to match and a large roomy bag which is rubber lined.

AMERICAN BATHING SUIT WORLD'S BEST

Paris, the style center of the world, lags far behind America in the design of one important feminine garment, according to Baron de Meyer, famous French stylist and fashion authority. That garment is the one-piece bathing suit.

The American one-piece may not be modest but it's the most modish garment of its kind in the world, the baron writes in Harper's Bazaar. Nothing—and only nothing—can equal it for showing off the feminine figure to the best advantage.

"Nothing made in Europe can beat the quality of the American-made bathing suit," Baron de Meyer writes. "No other suit of its kind apparently gives the female figure so perfect a shape."

In one way, however, the French suits have the bulge on all others. They're so tight that they cause their wearers to bulge in the wrong places, the baron says.

European bathing suits would improve, the French stylist believes, if their designers would spend their summer vacations on the beaches studying the needs of bathers. At present it is very difficult to obtain a stylish suit on the continent. The few women who do insist on smart bathing suits are obliged to have them made to order.

Wool Is About Smartest Thing for Sports Wear

If questioning whether or not wool is endurable for summer wear, since it is to be about the smartest thing for sports, try out the venture with a dress of kid angora. One will never know that one is wearing wool, so delightful is it to the touch. Then also, it comes in the faintest and loveliest of pastel colorings, so becoming that one can hardly resist its appeal.

Linen Mesh Underwear Relief in Hot Weather

Linen mesh underwear is something of a relief in hot weather. It is the kind about which it is said that it is hot in cold weather and cool in warm weather. As a matter of fact it does absorb perspiration far more readily than silk or cotton and those who wear it are loud in their pra Demurely simple is this beautiful gown of black crepe with a motif of large leaves etched in silver thread and silver sequins. With it is worn short gauntlet gloves of white suede.

Charming Little Coats Enhance Evening Gowns

Lovely little coats are worn over summer evening dresses. They are made in many fabrics, many styles. Some have short sleeves, some have capelets over the arms, some are really capes. One cape is made of finely pleated chiffon cut in points around the lower edge.

These little coats and capes are made in all the colors of the rainbow, and in black and white as well. If you sew cleverly, they are not difficult to make. And they certainly add much to the effectiveness of the summer wardrobe.

Some of them have a band of fur around the elbow sleeves.

—15—

At dusk they camped in a small thicket at the bottom of a deep dingle down near the lake level. Snow fell in the night sifting through the tree-tops. Amos, looking out in the morning, saw an inch or more of snow on the dingle sides.

"Hell's griddles!" he exclaimed. "We'll stay right here till that snow melts or wait till dark."

He had gathered leeks and dug some roots which he called wild potatoes. He filled a can with snow and held it between his legs while they ate. In that manner they were able to appease their thirst with the melted snow.

"Boy, ye're lookin' more like yerself," said Amos. "Ye've been griddled sorrowful and ye groan in yer sleep. Hold up yer heart. The Lord is with us or we'd never 'a' got this far. I'm goin' to tell ye that story o' John Smith's fight with the Turk in the siege o' Regall. It'll do ye good."

He listened a moment, peering out of the bushes. Then, having bitten off a chunk of tobacco, he lay down at Robert's side and in a voice just above a whisper began:

"We enlisted for the war in Pannonia under Henry Volda, the earl o' Meldritch, who was fightin' the Turks. It was in the siege o' Regall that Smith had his first big adventure. That city was a hard nut to crack. We endured a terrible gallin'. One day we heard a distant trumpet and see a party sallyin' toward us under a flag o' truce. It bore a message sayin' that many believed we would make no assault but would soon show them our heels. Would we, their Lord Turbishaw hankered to know, oblige them with a fight afore leavin'? Many ladies was in and near the camp. They was crazy to see a fight. He begged that we choose one o' our captains to fight one o' theirs, each for the other's head. Our general agreed. Our captains was eager for the fight. They had suffered a month o' tauntin' from the enemy. They drew lots for the chance o' cuttin' off a Turk's head. The honor fell to my friend John Smith. So at the time set the troops are lined on three sides. The other side is a wall. All along the top o' it the Turkish officers and their ladies are sittin' like a row o' pigeons on a fence.

"The Turk come in first, in full armor, with long lance, on a beautiful white horse that leaped and caracoled to the sound o' the hautboys. On the Turk's shoulders was a pair o' eagle's wings bordered with silver. There was shin ornaments on his corselet.

"The trumpets played. Smith entered in plain armor. They stood a second, lances poised, waitin' for the word. They charged at a swift gallop."

Amos paused. His quick ear had caught a disturbing sound. He arose and peered through the bushes. "The devil and his dogs!" he whispered. "We're ambushed."

The young man arose and drew his sword.

"Put that away," Amos commanded. "They'd eat us up in a fight. Just take a look."

Robert peered over the shoulder of his friend. Around the top of the dingle a ring of savages surrounded them, each sitting on his heels like a greyhound, motionless and silent as the Sphinx of Egypt, looking toward them.

Amos took two small acorns from a pocket in his doublet. He handed one to his comrade and whispered: "Put that under yer tongue. It's loaded. If it comes to torture crack the shell in yer teeth. In less'n a minute ye'll be out o' hell and on er way to heaven. Don't resist, whatever they do, unless I say fight."

They put the acorns in their mouths. Amos stepped out of the bushes, took off his hat and bowed, saying: "Ho! hoo! hooo!"

The savages arose and ran toward them from all sides.

They were Algonquins who came around the white men chattering in low guttural tones. They were on the warpath in the enemy's country and their love of noise was therefore under restraint. There were thirty-three in the band, with shiny greased hair and bodies. Their faces were grotesquely painted. Some had a curious, hobgoblin look with bands of black and red paint crossing their cheeks and foreheads. Some were tattooed with crude designs of the snake and the eagle. A few had hair only on one side of their heads. All were beardless and low-browed with small, black, glistening eyes put to no nobler uses than those of a rat—the finding of food and enemies.

They were naked save for skins hanging from a girdle above the hips and falling about half way to the knees. Bows and quivers filled with arrows hung on their backs. Each carried a long curving shield hewn out of cedar wood.

Amos knew many words of their language. He told them that Tessohat, their great, one-eyed chief, was his friend. A savage made them to understand that Tessohat was dead.

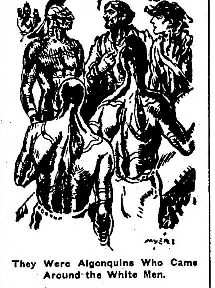
Amos told them as best he could, with the help of many gestures, of their journey through the wilderness and of a great band of Iroquois not ten leagues away in the south. Its numbers were indicated by broken sticks. He made it clear to them that the French and Dutch would give much wampum and many skins as a ransom for himself and comrade.

The chief of the band was a shapely young Indian, taller than the others. He touched his breast and pointed northward and said "Kebec." Amos nodded his approval and, turning to his friend said:

"They will take us to the French unless they dream that we ought to be killed. We'll give up our weapons and trust to luck."

Amos gave up his knife and gun and saw and hatchet, Robert his sword and pistol. The savages sat down around them with grunts and ho's of delight as they examined these treasures. Suddenly a young redskin came running with a word that seemed to carry good news. Robert writes in his diary that it sounded like "Genundequaho!"

The band got to its feet. Long lashes of strong hide were noosed around a leg of each captive and tightly drawn and fastened just below the knee. They were led to the great lake, the surface of which was covered by a thick fog. Canoes were quickly and silently hauled out of a thicket of evergreens and pushed into the water. There were six of them, the largest about five fathoms long. Robert and Amos were shipped with the chief, between the paddlers, of whom there were four in each of the larger craft. The fleet left the shore, the paddlers resting on their knees, and the boats were soon lined, some twenty feet apart, in deep water.



They Were Algonquins Who Came Around the White Men.

It amazed the young Englishman to observe how silently and powerfully they sped through the still water. All that day and through the night that followed it, with never a pause for food or a word spoken, they kept their pace. At rare intervals a paddler would stop and pick up a wooden cup, fill it at the side, toss its contents into a wide mouth, lay it down, take up the paddle and continue his work. The next day they came out of the mist into narrow water.

By and by the great river of the north lay before them, a mighty, moving caravan of waters a full falcon-shot in width under a cloudy sky. It was one of the arteries of the pulsing heart of the wilderness somewhere in the remote and mysterious inlands. Without a pause or a word spoken they sheered northeastward on the river plane roughened, here and there, by whirls and ripples. There was something admirable in the patient, Spartan-like devotion of these red men to their task. Here they began to chatter, and nearing the far shore, they greeted it with loud ho's of satisfaction.

Amos and Romert were so stiffened by the long sit that, for a little time, they endured great pain in their efforts to stand. The savages, broken to all hardship on land and water, were much amused by their discomfort and greeted it with loud laughter. They made a fire and took from one of the canoes a pot of greasy bear's flesh and set it to boil. As the heat began to stir this revolting mass, leaf mold, small twigs, hairs and pine needles were playing about on the surface of the boiling fat.

Robert wrote in his diary:

"This repast was a torment. As a punishment it was as successful as the journey. I found some relief in them. I have thought so much of my discomfort that I had no time to think of troubles. It shocked me a little to see the savages, after they had cooled the pot in water, paw around in it with their unwashed hands and long, clawlike, dirty finger nails. Why should I care for my own refined feeling in the matter? They ate like swine. So did I. One thing they did which I could not do. They wiped their greasy hands in their hair and on their naked skin. Amos tells me that they keep their hair and bodies greased for two reasons: it helps them to slip through the bushes, also fleas and mosquitoes and lice find their skin a less agreeable feeding place.

"I wonder how a pair of Puritans will make out with the French. My mother, who died when I was a lad of ten, was a French lady of the distinguished Brebeuf family. One of them—a priest—is said to be in Canada. Fortunately I have well-known friends in France and am able to speak the language, and neither Amos nor I is quarrelsome. We must do our best to make a good impression at Kebec if they take us there."

They had not long to wait. They came next day to the range of lofty cliffs crowned with a fortification, ramparted with logs, above which a French flag was flying. Down by the shore there were a number of one-story warehouses, built of logs chinked with moss. Among the savages they took the zigzag path leading upward. An officer in a plumed hat stopped them. In good French Robert told him of their plight. Taking them to be Frenchmen, unarmed and harmless, the officer said:

"I will go with you to Father LeJeune."

They found the kindly Father in the chapel—a structure built of planks and mud and thatched with meadow grass. It stood on a low plateau in a palisaded inclosure. The savages waited outside the palisade while the white men entered with the officer. The chapel's altar was decorated with images of Loyola, Xavier and the dove. It was called Notre Dame des Anges. Robert knelt in prayer before the altar. Father LeJeune, superior of the residence, entered. He wore a close black cassock. A rosary hung from his belt, a wide black hat, looped at the sides, was in his hand. Robert arose and bowed.

"Whence came you?" the Father asked.

"From Boston far in the south," Robert answered.

"What seek you here?"

"The mercy of God."

"Are you not English, and our enemies?"

"We are English but not your enemies. We know of your devotion to the will of our common Master. It has won our admiration. I am not worthy to kiss your feet, but I love you for the spirit of sacrifice that has brought you to the wilderness and which keeps you here. My mother was a French lady and a Catholic. Only the cruel folly of misguided rulers turned my father from the ancient church."

"The sword and the strong hand as a means of conversion will ever be a failure," the Father answered gravely as he shook his head. "Meanwhile I have a letter which, I think, relates to you. A Dutch trader brought it from the far south to the great river and sent it to me by an Algonquin chief. It came to my hand less than a week ago."

Exactness Carried to Extremes by Japanese

The Japanese people are great imitators. A certain Frenchman, visiting in Japan, had his dress suit ruined by a mishap on the part of a waiter at a dinner. What was to be done? They advised the European to order another dress suit from a Japanese tailor, giving the suit that had been ruined as a model.

"Your suit will be exactly reproduced," they told him. "You will not even have to try it on."

At the end of some days the Japanese tailor brought the finished work.

"This grease stain has given me a great deal of trouble to reproduce," said he, "and that is why I must charge you a trifle higher than what I usually ask."

There the stain was on the new suit, exactly like the original stain on the ruined suit.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Indians Fear Lightning

No Navajo Indian will ever make a campfire of wood from a tree that has been struck by lightning or that he thinks may have been. If such a fire is made by the irreverent white man, the Indian will retire to a distance, where he can neither feel the heat nor smell the smoke, and will go to sleep in his blanket, fireless and supperless, rather than eat of food prepared on that kind of tree. The Navajo believes that if he comes within the influence of the flame he will absorb some of the essence of the lightning which will sooner or later kill him. In the mountains of the Navajo country more than half the great pines are scarred by lightning, but no wood from them is used.

Witty Rejoinder

The story is told of the then prince of Wales, afterward King William IV, that in bantering with the secretary of the admiralty the prince said: "When I am king, you shall not be the secretary of the admiralty!" "God save the king!" answered the secretary.

SERVICE— THAT WAS COXIE

By FANNIE HURST

(©, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

IN THE eyes of the world, Coxie was somewhat of an enigma. He was one of the most successful life insurance agents in his district, a large metropolitan one, and yet he never seemed to get anywhere. That is, he never seemed to get anywhere in the sense that his less successful colleagues did. People in a position to judge estimated that Coxie's earning capacity, what with the policies he was writing from year to year, should have carried him to a high-figure income.

The jolly little fellow, worming his way up from office boy of the vice president of the huge company that employed him, had managed to capture the liking of the theatrical profession. Most of his policies were confined to the people of the play world. He had a way with them. He loved their emotional, volatile, friendly qualities and they in turn, because of those qualities, reacted with enthusiasm to Coxie.

He was so downright likeable. His round, good-humored face radiated amiability and something strangely deeper. Coxie had a soul. He felt it. And here let it be said that there were those in the profession who knew, almost reverently, that Coxie had a soul. These were the people who knew why Coxie, unlike his colleagues who drove cars and bought country homes, continued to live, a somewhat reluctant bachelor, in a rooming house and use the subway.

It was said of Coxie by one of these clients of his who had reason to know that he had a soul, that it was simply impossible for the little insurance agent to sit by and see a policy lapse for want of funds. His faith in human nature was so enormous. His confidence in the ultimate decency of human beings was infallible. If his confidence in these dealings had on various occasions been undermined, Coxie was the last to confess it. He went on believing and he went on digging into his own pockets to meet payments that for one reason or another could not be paid—and all these reasons were passionately poured into Coxie's sympathetic ears.

Men and women died blessing Coxie in sentimental and unashamed gratitude. Coxie had saved many a gay Thespian from a pauper's grave; and many a Thespian's child from the pinch of poverty.

And the little man himself, known to all Broadway, loved by Broadway, loving it in return, gloried in his job. Service . . . that was Coxie.

The fly in the ointment, however, was as big as a frog in the puddle. There were ragged hurting edges to Coxie's heart and the reason was Annabelle Evans. Strangely enough, she was not of the theater. She was a forelady in an artificial flower factory. She and Coxie had met at a theatrical benefit for disabled children and for twelve years had been unofficially engaged, as the saying goes.

Twice a week, Coxie took Annabelle, who was pretty in a birdlike fashion, to a theater or to a motion picture and on Saturday night spent the evening with her in the prim parlor of the prim little flat she shared with a prim little aunt. Coxie loved Annabelle and, in what was becoming a tearful, patient and almost hysterical fashion, Annabelle loved Coxie.

The fact of the matter was that Coxie could not afford to marry. That is, unless he permitted Annabelle to continue her work in the flower factory. That prospect was abominable to both of them. Not only did Annabelle dislike her work, but she had developed a curious racking cough from her surroundings.

Time and time again, Coxie, who bore with her beratings because he felt he deserved them, promised to conserve his income which in its entirety was more than sufficient for them to start life together in comfort and even a small degree of luxury. But year after year showed a deficit in Coxie's finances. He could not let a policy lapse and since his writings were in the name of the most improvident people in the world, constant and multiple were the demands upon him.

And then the inevitable happened. It had not ever occurred to Coxie that is could happen, but it did and that was probably the reason that this little man of indomitable good faith, good will and good heart, found himself crushed.

A rival for the hand of Annabelle Evans stepped in. It had all happened so quickly that Coxie walked around Broadway for two days thereafter with his moon-round face all fuddled with daze.

A young shipping clerk in the factory where Annabelle was employed had fallen heir to ten thousand dollars. To Annabelle's astonishment, it seemed that he had looked upon her with yearning for years and now it had all come about and was possible. The young shipping clerk wanted to marry at once, and suddenly, after years of the procrastination, the delay and the disappointments and the deferred hopes that went with Coxie; here was a concrete opportunity to [illegible] happiness.

A home of her own. Freedom from the work that she hated. Freedom from the worrisome cough that racked her health.

It was a tempting chance. For years Annabelle had confused her love of Coxie with a love of home—of comfort, of safety. To her, marriage meant freedom from the misery of daily grind in a factory. Freedom to make a home that would bring happiness not only to herself, but to the man who provided it for her.

And now here was her chance. At once, without further delay, she could have her home, freedom from work she hated, a chance to regain the health she was afraid of losing. It was too good a chance. Annabelle's longing hopes were dazed with this chance of fruition.

Coxie was terrified by this blow more than by anything that had ever happened to him, feeling the entire meaning of life slipping between his heart and his fingers, but he dared ont intercede. Annabelle was right. Annabelle's aunt, who had long since lost patience with Coxie, was right.

The young shipping clerk's name was Macy. A nice enough boy with a lean face and a nervous habit of blinking his eyes. When Coxie first laid eyes on him the evening that Annabelle had told him her decision, it seemed to him almost more than he could bear. This young man was about to inherit the earth. Coxie must go out empty-handed, empty-hearted.

And then, as if Fate had not been sufficiently content with handing him this wallop in the abstract, there developed, in the course of the brief conversation Coxie had with Macy, this ironical fact: The money which young Macy had inherited was from a distant uncle whom he had never seen. This uncle was an actor whom Coxie had insured ten years before.

Time after time, Coxie had met these premiums, reluctant to let the old man's policy lapse. Meanwhile his wife and those immediately dependent upon him died and in stepped this lad as the only surviving relative.

Life had played boomerang to Coxie, except that the story does not end here. Curious thing. When Annabelle, who was not present during the conversation between the two men which brought about this disclosure, came back into the room, that new look of decision which had been on her face for the last few days was suddenly removed from it. Looking at her, the two men seemed to know almost simultaneously that Annabelle was not going through with the engagement to Macy.

That is precisely what happened.

Annabelle and Coxie are together three evenings a week again. Coxie, with his kind, round face fairly bursting with determination, promises that this year his deficit in his income is to be a surplus.

They plan to be married on New Year's eve.

"Changing Britain," as Seen by German Writer

I have the impression that the phrase "changing England," or, better yet, "changing British empire," really holds good, for a great transformation has begun whose end no one can foresee.

At the beginning of the World war, Bernard Shaw said that it was terrible difficult to hammer a new idea into the heads of the English, but that it was utterly impossible to dislodge an idea once it had entered there. It was years before England recognized the significance of the decision it had made when it declared war and came to understand that things would never take care of themselves again in accordance with the old-fashioned belief to that defect.

In like manner, it has taken England years to understand that the end of the war did not mean a return to prewar conditions. Things were allowed to proceed of their own accord, and at first they went well enough, but presently they began going from bad to worse, yet nobody grew excited. Up to a year ago most people believed that time would adjust everything, and only a few private individuals or politicians thought that radical measures were necessary or even desirable.

Now, however, opinion has altered fundamentally, and the English no longer say: "It will all come right in the end," but, "Something has got to be done." This is a vague enough conviction, to be sure, but it signifies a tremendous change. England has a new idea in its head, and Shaw knows his fellow countrymen.—Paul Cohen-Portheim in the Tagebuch, Berlin.

Famous Painting Restored

In the baptistry of the cathedral of Seville is a famous painting of "St. Anthony and the Christ Child" by Murillo. In 1874 the kneeling figure of St. Anthony of Padua was cut from the canvas. Soon it was offered for sale in New York by a Spaniard, who sought out a well known collector, Mr. Schaus. The latter, who knew of the theft of the figure from the Murillo painting, paid $250 for the work. He then notified the Spanish consul. The figure was returned and amid public festivities it was restored to the baptistry.

Many Scotch Pews Empty

Religious leaders in Scotland are becoming alarmed over the decline in church attendance. Congregations in some parts of the country are dwindling to only a faithful score or so. Churches capable to seating 500 or 600 worshipers are attended by a few dozen. It is predicted that a number of places of worship must be closed for lack of support.

Mennonites in Paraguay

The Mennonites, reputed descendants of the Dutch Waldenses of the Middle ages, have found a haven in the Paraguayan Chaco. They went to South America after their venture had failed in Prussia, Russia and Canada. The government of Paraguay granted them a colonization concession in 1921 and the colony now numbers 1,400 persons. Their charter allows them to maintain schools in their own language, German. Also, they are exempt from military service and swearing in court, affirmation being sufficient. The Mennonites are desirable colonists, especially if allowed to live according to the traditions of their ancestors.

Better Pay Up!

An old hardened criminal in the Minnesota State Prison was asked recently what was the first step that led to his ruin, and he answered: "The first step that led to my downfall was cheating an editor out of two years subscription. When I had done that the devil had such a grip on me that I could not shake him off."

We are not printing this because we need money, but for your own sake we don't want to see any of our subscribers in the same plight as that fellow. If you should owe some paper it might be well to pay up before such a thing does happen to you.--Tioga Gazette.

Pity the Poor Newspaper Man

It is reported that one of our fastidious newly-married ladies kneads dough with her gloves on. The incident may be somewhat peculiar, but there are others.

Our Boss needs "dough" with his shoes on; he needs dough with his shirt on; he needs dough with his pants on; and unless some of our delinquent subscribers pay before long, the Boss will need dough without a damned thing on, and this is no Garden of Eden in the winter time.--Ex.

OWATONNA EDITOR WINS FIRST PRIZE IN STATE FAIR CONTEST

Entries by Soper, Williams and Kain Chosen in Order by Journalist Jugdes.

HUGH H. SOPER
TOM A. WILLIAMS
J.N.KAIN

Winner of first prize in the second annual editorial contest conducted by the Minnesota State Fair, Hugh H. Soper of the Owatonna Journal-Chronicle is receiving the congratulations of his friends of the Minnesota press.

The State Fair will award him $50 in gold and a desk ornament for his editorial, "Show the World—and Yourself."

Tom A. Williams of the Murray County Herald at Slayton won second prize of $30, and the third, $20, went to J. N. Kain of the Round Lake Graphic. Both of these also will receive desk ornaments.

Contest judges were Dowsley Clark of the Minneapolis Tribune, P. J. Halstead of the St. Paul Dispatch and Pioneer Press, Dow G. Congdon of the Minneapolis Journal, Gus Wollan of the St. Paul Daily News and George Quise of the Minneapolis Star.

Mr. Soper's editorial:

Show the World—And Yourself.

Minnesota's great state fair—without doubt the finest of its kind in America—will be held September 5 to 12 this year, and fair officials, exhibitors and those of us for whom it is primarily assembled are already beginning to plan for it. This planning, and the active efforts which will result, are due to make the 1931 Minnesota State Fair the greatest and best, from educational and entertainment viewpoints alike, in history. So as Minnesotans, we may look forward to an unusual treat in this, our own splendid state institution.

Nearly all phases of Minnesota life and industry are available for presentation at the fair, and the number which appear there, giving the world a clearer estimate of the greatness of the North Star state, is constantly growing. Such being the case, it lies with us to co-operate in benefitting Minnesota, ourselves and those beyond our borders in two ways: First, by assuring that the picture of Minnesota presented at the fair is an accurate one, with the best exhibits in all various departments on display, through our own exhibit entries or our interest in fostering those of our fellows; secondly, by making every effort possible to bring about increased interest in the fair among others. Let us show the world the greatness of Minnesota!

To achieve these aims, it is of course necessary that we first become convinced ourselves. —And that is easily possible through a day or two at the fair. We may live in Minnesota for 36 years, as we have—or for more or less—and feel that we are fairly well informed in the vast and varied advantages of the finest of the nation's commonwealths. Nothing provides more enlightenment, however, as to the meager limitations of our knowledge, than a day or two at the fair.

So, while we're selling Minnesota to the world, through the medium of the most representative agency, the Minnesota State Fair, let's also sell Minnesota to ourselves—and through that fine medium. There is no place where one can secure greater knowledge of Minnesota's great place in agriculture and in industry, her leadership in education and in commerce, her preeminent standing as a land of beautiful recreation spots, her wealth of natural resources, than at the fair. There is no one locality where one can secure better estimate of her beauty and the fine character of her people than at the fair.

Let's show the world—and ourselves! See you at the fair.

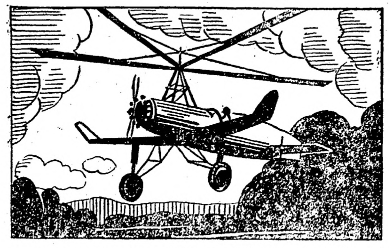
AUTOGIRO COMING TO STATE FAIR



The outstanding aviation thriller on the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show program will be daily flights by an autogiro, the windmill type of airplane. The autogiro can take-off sharply after a short run, "hover" in the air like a big kite, and descend more slowly than a man in a parachute. Side-slipping and tailspins are impossible in this new type of safety ship, according to its inventors.

Notice for Bids

Bids will be opened on Route 1, Route 2 and Route 3, School Dist. No. 35, for bus driving. The plat of the Routes may be seen at the clerk's office.

Bids must be in the hands of the clerk by 5 o'clock p. m. Aug. 17th, 1931. The Board reserves the right to reject any or all bids.

QUIST IS NEW GAME WARDEN

W. H. Quist of Thief River Falls is the new state game and fish deparment warden for this territory, taking the place of A. E. Forder, it has been announced.

Reorganization of the personnel of the Minnesota Department of Game and Fish was virtually completed recently by Commissioner W. D. Stewart and Deputy Commissioner Louis Enstrom who announced appointment of 153 game wardens thruout the state.

Sixteen wardens have been added to the Game and Fish Department in an effort to tighten enforcement of game and fish laws.

Commissioner Stewart announced that 80 of the present wardens will be retained, temporarily at least. The list includes 73 new wardens named to the present 20 districts into which the enforcement group is divided.

Commissioner Stewart and Mr. Enstrom later will work out the remaining reorganization plans which call for a decrease in the present 20 districts to 10.

The appointments include no chief district wardens, Mr. Enstrom said, as ten supervisors will be selected after the state has been redistricted.

Besides saving salaries paid to the twenty chief wardens, the decrease in districts will enable the main office to keep in better touch with the men, Mr. Enstrom said.

W. D. Miller of Crookston was appointed to take the place of Wm. Munch, but only as a common game warden.

L. Shaver made a business trip to Wannaska Monday.

Helena Johnson spent the week end at the R. F. Smith home.

Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. A. Swanson and children, Mr. and Mrs. E. Sorter and children, Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Folden and children, Mrs. Anna Gavere, Helen and Bertha Hanson and Edna Steien were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Smith on Sunday afternoon.

Father LeJeune drew the letter from his pocket and gave it to Robert. It was written in French. The young man read and reread it with a thrill of joy and astonishment. The Father gave him permission to keep it and this is the letter now copied from his diary:

"From a small Trading Post in the wilderness north of Fort Orange on the Lake of the Iroquois.

"December 5, 1636.

"To the excellent Father LeJeune: Last year I heard of your work from your bishop in Paris. First I desire to assure you that the best wishes of myself and my friends are with you in the difficult task you have undertaken. I now seek your kind offices in a matter which involves the happiness of many good people. Six weeks ago a young man of the name of Robert Heathers went into the wilderness with his guide at a point far up the coast from Boston. Since then they have not been heard from. It is feared that they have fallen a prey to wild beasts or been captured by the savages, or that they are lost and starving in the great waste. If news of them should come to you and it should be possible for you to render them any service it would be rewarded not only with our gratitude but with such a share of our substance as would, I am sure, contribute something to your comfort and success. If perchance he should arrive at your residence I beg of you to give him hospitality and what help you can. His father is a gentleman, his mother was one of your own race. I and my brother are with trader Van Brocklin near the south end of the Lake of the Iroquois. In about ten days we shall be going south and at New Amsterdam shall take water for Boston, which we hope to reach before Christmas.

"With deep respect and hearty greetings,

"Yours Faithfully,
"Peggy Weld."

When the young man had finished with the letter Father LeJeune asked: "Who is your mother?"

"Catherine de Brebeuf."

The Father's interest in the young man deepened suddenly.

"Of the noble family of Brebeuf in Normandy?" he asked.

"The same."

"You have a relative in residence here—our beloved Pere Utile, Jean de Brebeuf. He is now out feeding the cattle and the swine. I will send for him."

"Jean de Brebeuf! I remember him well. He was with us when my mother died."

When the large gray-bearded Father Brebeuf entered in his soiled, coarse black cossack he greeted the boy with kisses and affectionate enthusiasm. Thus, favored by fortune and the sincere good will of the young man the captives found themselves on a friendly footing in a situation naturally difficult. Robert had brought in his pockets an ample store of English money. This he offered freely to secure what was needed for the ransom of himself and his friend.

"My cousin, you have come to a land where money is of less value than glass beads and seashells and shiny trinkets," said Jean de Brebeuf. "I will give to each brave a hatchet and a double handful of glass beads. That will be sufficient. For this you may give me five pounds. We have been generous with the Algonquins. They are our friends. We have given them many blankets."

Then Robert voiced his urgent feeling:

"We must be going south as soon as possible."

The good Father answered: "You might get down to the Dutch through the lands of the Iroquois—a fierce people. You would need the help of God in this journey."

Father Brebeuf went with Robert and Amos to the trading post, followed by the eager band of savages. Soon the latter were shouting and chattering over their trinkets, as happy as a group of children. The captives were free, and their tools and weapons were returned to them.

This was no sooner accomplished than the red men began to gamble with their new wealth in their favorite dish game. It was played with six plum stones, white on one side and black on the other. The players were divided in two opposing sides. A brave was chosen to shake the dish. They guessed on the number of white or black to appear when the dish was shaken and dumped. They bet heavily. In a little time a noisy contention rose between the opposing sides. Two men were chosen to decide the issue in a fight. They fought like fishermen, grabbing each other's hair. Each with fists full of hair they struggled and twisted and jerked in a frightful fashion. No word came from either. Being well-matched the encounter continued until the white men turned away wearied by its brutality and went to the house of Madame Hebert, who lived with her daughter and son-in-law Monsieur Couillard. Built of logs and quite weather-proof it was the only real house in Canada. Madame had cleared and cultivated a tract of land. Her efforts kept her family and the Fathers supplied with grain, small fruits and vegetables. A cheery, kindly soul she was like a mother to those lonely men who were giving their lives in a fruitless sowing among rocks and thorns.

She greeted Brebeuf fondly as Le Bon Pere Utile, his title at the Residence, and offered the hospitality of her house to the two Englishmen. With soap and towels they went down to the river with the Father for a bath. Returning at dusk by the way of the trading post, they saw the fighters still embraced and writhing and twisting and struggling in silence like a pair of bulldogs on the ground. Only two of the band remained to watch them.

"Let us go to the Indian cabin and find the chief and try to stop this," said the Father.

The cabin was built of poles covered with bark and wattled up with boughs at one end. It was for the accommodation of visiting Indians. Clean when the warriors arrived it was now like a pig-pen, ill-smelling and the carpet of boughs covered with litter. Two fires were burning. A part of the smoke went up through holes in the roof, but much of it clouded the atmosphere of the long room and was a torment to the eyes of a white man. On every side were naked bodies, black and overheated by the fires, mingled pell-mell with dogs just arrived with a band of hunters. Father Brebeuf found the young chief and prevailed upon him to go and stop the fight.

"They like us not to interfere in their affairs and we do it with restraint," said the Father. "The young chief has been baptized but, alas, their customs and superstitions are the growth of ages. Naturally they are deeper rooted than the new faith. It is more difficult than clearing and planting the wild land. You have seen how stubborn they are. We are patient. Some will yield to us and confess their sins and take on a humble and becoming spirit. We baptize them. A dream or the arrival of an Iroquois captive will turn them back to savagery. Still God can make the mountains to be a plain."

"Let Us Go to the Indian Cabin and Find the Chief and Try to Stop This," Said the Father.

At the table of Madame Hebert the Englishmen sat with her family and three Fathers and two lay brothers. Three other Fathers were then out in the forest with the wild men. They had a dinner of roasted moose meat with wine and baked potatoes and good bread eaten with a conserve of dried berries.

"This is in honor of the kinsmen of our dear Father Brebeuf," said madame. "We are wont to fare more simply. When the winter is far spent you would find us fasting or dining with a piece of bread and a little wine."

There was much talk of the sweet land of wheat and vines and of the good cooking to be found in Paris. It was a joy to these lonely people to hear Robert tell of the adventures of himself and his friend on their journey.

When they went to bed Robert read the letter to his wise old comrade, asking at the last word:

"What is the meaning of this?"

"That's as easy as lookin' through a window," said Amos. "The sweet gal is in love with ye. The whole town thinks ye're guilty and she don't. If she does she don't think it's anything to be hung for. There's a gal like them in the time o' Queen Bess. She believes in takin' her enjoyment while she's alive instead o' waitin' till she's dead. She's broke with Rosewell and she wants you. I'll tell ye what's behind all this. She coaxed her brother to come with her. That gal has studied the maps o' Hudson and Champlain in the governor's house. She knew that if we got to the big waterways from north to south we'd make for Kebec or New Amsterdam. I reckon she made up her mind that if she could find ye she'd lead ye to New Amsterdam and marry ye right there, by the grace o' God, and ship ye off to Holland with her, and why not I'd like to know?"

"I can think of worse things that could happen to me," said Robert. "I wonder why she has turned against Rosewell. He's a much handsomer man."

"That all depends on the pair o' eyes that's lookin' at him. He was not the man for her. He's half dead,—his body in this world, his mind in the hereafter. Argues about what it means to be justified and sanctified. How would a gal like Peggy get along with that for breakfast, dinner and supper? She'd get the cramps quick."

"Well, let's get away from here and try to push down to that Dutchman's trading post," Robert proposed.

"As soon as ever we can," his friend answered. "I'm as anxious as a terrier at a rat hole. Amos is happier than he has been in the last two moons."

The comfort of being out of peril in a good bed was a thing that they loved to recall in the long days ahead. They overslept that night and were not awakened till Father Brebeuf came to the door He said that a band of Algonquins were soon going over to the Lake of the Iroquois to meet a Dutch trader who came up in the first snow moon to sell them strong water and to get the otter skins taken far north of the great river.

"He will have a shallop on the long lake," said the Father. "You could go with him to their fort in the south. If you do, God help you to persuade him that he is damning his own soul by selling strong water to these wild folk. It is an evil thing and only a son of Satan would be doing it. Our own French people coming on the ships give us sore trouble and put our lives in danger with this vile traffic."

In leaving, Robert rewarded Madame Hebert with a generous gift for the good cause and thanks as sincere as any he had ever spoken.

"Do you see how these heathen have battered the front of our house with stones?" the Father asked as they were going away. "That was done when many were dying of the plague. They thought it due to the anger of their gods for our being here. We nursed them. We gave them food and medicine yet they stoned us, and save for God's mercy, we should have been slain. It is like living thousands of years ago with a people who have neither home nor country nor laws nor possessions."

Father Brebeuf went with them and the band of warriors to the shore. He had given Robert a letter to Father Cauvet who was with the Algonquins on an island near the Canadian shore, bounded on the south by impenetrable rapids. In their canoe he put next to the young man an old brave who had been converted and baptized and who had served a summer on the lands of the Residence. He had acquired a smatter of French. His name was Achawat. They set out under a clear sky in warm sunlight.

"I begin to think we'll get through," said Robert with a sigh. "And perhaps in time to meet our friends."

"I have held my tongue so long it is gettin' rusty," Amos answered as he bit off a chunk of tobacco.

"Then it will be a good time to tell me what happened to John Smith," Robert proposed.

Amos began: "We'll take another bite at that cherry and with good luck we'll get it swallered. It's the right kind o' music for ye. The Turk and Cap'n John rode at each other. It was a pretty sight. We Turk haters were breathin' short. Hell's griddles! It seemed as if the horses would slam each other down. Then we split our throats yellin'. Smith's lance had gone through the sight o' the Turk's helmet. The infidel was on the ground kickin' like a beheaded rooster. Then—he lay quiet. Smith dismounted and unbraced the dead man's helmet. In a minute he had his trophy.

Remarkable Low Note on Australian Organ

On the great organ in Sydney town hall, Australia, is a pedal stop of 64 feet. The pipe actually of that length, the lowest C, does not stand upright, but is bent in several places, so that it may be accommodated in the interior of the instrument. The note this giant pipe emits—the stop is a reed stop, a "contra-posaune"—is fearsome. It is more like a cavernous growl than a musical note, and one of the little jokes of the tuner when he is showing visitors through the great army of pipes in this organ is to have the famous 64-foot pedal pipe sounded when the visitor is alongside it and not expecting the shock. It is an unfailing surprise. The vibrations of this low C can almost be counted—in which regard, no doubt, the note resembles that of the basso-profundo whose boast it was that he had always to begin to sing his lowest note 32 beats before it was needed, since it took so long to become audible to the listener!

Siam's National Flower

The chrysanthemum, regent of oriental gardens, but comparatively new in the Occident, is about to have its one thousand six hundredth birthday. Following its arrival in Japan and China from Korea in the early 300's, the little pompon was immediately adopted by oriental royalty. The chrysanthemum still remains the national flower of Siam. In Japan the 16-petaled flower adorns the emperor's crest. The star and collar, emblem of the Imperial Order of the Chrysanthemum, is the choicest decoration the emperor of Japan can bestow and is seldom found on the breast of any save royalty.

THE OLD MUSIC TEACHER

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THE music teacher was seventy-three. She was a little old lady. She had not always been so little. As a girl, she had been at least an inch or two taller. These added inches, coupled with an enormous amount of vitality, had made her appear larger than she really was. But the long years of position at the piano and the amount of work she had done sitting hunched over musical scores, had taken their toll in actual inches. At seventy-three, she was frankly full of years; bent, loose-skinned and, worst of all, racked and all but ruined by rheumatism.

Her once supple fingers were as knotted as hickory sticks. They lay upon the keys, when she permitted herself to open the lid of her beloved piano, like so many lumps of inertia. Horrible, gnarled, stiff old fingers, knotted and rigid with age. In the beginning, when the rheumatism began its first merciless onslaught, the madam used to have a horror of her hands. She could not bear to look at them. She kept them behind her when visitors called.

But there came the day when she found herself obliged to be reconciled; to shift her point of view, to take up the new threads of a new life.

For ten years the little madam had now reconciled herself to the fact that she must live off the bounty of her former pupils. And they were many. In her day, the music teacher had enjoyed brilliant and outstanding success in her field. Names that were to become world-famous had walked out of her studio, equipped for the concert stage. From all over the country children had journeyed to her, accompanied by parents or guardians, filled with the hope that the little madam would see in them talent sufficient to warrant her taking them as pupils.

The great Moritzy had been prepared for his triumphant career in madam's studio. Lilienthal, Mann, Forenzi, Lanz and Spamer were all of the brilliant company of madam's pupils. She had worked with them with a patience, with an understanding and with a wisdom that was unfaltering. Her hour lessons could easily stretch into two or three or five. And in the case of Spamer, probably the most infallible genius of them all, she had taken him free of fee into her home, under the surveillance of her constant guidance, her untiring patience.

No wonder that, at seventy-three, madam looked her age. She had fought so many separate battles. She had achieved so many individual successes. She had conquered obstacles for so many human beings. She had given of herself, of her vitality and of her time; of her wisdom and of her curious musical instinct.

It was as if she had been a well of inspiration and vitality—a well of inspiration from which those with the genius of music could drink. Could drink, and then go forth and conquer their worlds.

Madam herself had never been a brilliant piano performer. But she was undoubtedly the most brilliant teacher of her time. She did not play Brahms with any outstanding facility, but she knew his heart to the core. Forenzi once said of her that she knew Beethoven better than Beethoven could have known himself.

She had a wonderful faculty for passing on this knowledge of the masters she loved—to the pupils she loved. She could train fingers and brains and hearts to interpret the beauties which the great musicians of the past had captured for the future by means of little marks on paper. Madam could interpret the soul of music and could give her pupils, in magnified degree, this gift of interpreting its soul.

Though her own fingers, even in her prime, had never had the facility, the power, to transfer to the keyboard of a piano the depths of the music she studied and loved, her brain had the faculty of giving others the gift she lacked.

No wonder her former pupils never forgot her. She made them. She created them. She lived in them, long after her active life was ended.

On her seventy-third birthday, as was their wont, as many of her former pupils as were within possible distance, gathered around her. The birthday of madam was an outstanding occasion. Not only her pupils, but the important names of the musical world, came flocking to her little home, bearing gifts of affection for the little lady whose day had passed.

Of course there was something pathetic and heart-hurting about these birthdays. Each one found her a little smaller and a little more gnarled and a great deal more crippled. She never referred to this last condition, but those who knew her knew with what yearning eyes she gazed upon the young proteges and musical talents who were brought to her home from time to time just to be able to say that they had looked upon and met the great little madam.

It was difficult to realize, upon these birthday occasions when the world remembered, the lonely, despairing three-hundred-sixty-four days that preceded them. Here was a woman whose life had been crammed to the hilt. Not with lovers. Not, strangely enough, with the adulation of men. But with the devotion and crying need of hundreds of human beings who looked to her for the fulfillment of their destinies.

Her own life had been crammed with the task of creating other lives, of moulding them into success, of bringing out in them talents and genius in order that they might shower the beauties of talent and genius upon the world.

It was not easy after years filled with this kind of accomplishment to sit back, old and gnarled and helpless, in an easy chair, waiting. Because that was what it practically amounted to, those three-hundred-sixty-four days of the year when madam's world was too busy to pause at her door. Checks came from her erstwhile pupils, gifts and sometimes letters, but for three-hundred-sixty-four days in the year she was practically alone, waiting for the one day when they remembered to come.

And this one day was all too brief. It began in a shower of flowers. It ended in the adieus, blessings and the many happy returns of friends and benefactors of her wisdom who loved her. But almost before the door closed on the last of them, the waiting began again.

And yet, in a way, the little madam, who hated to be alone, would begin to console herself the very first night of the three-hundred-sixty-four that stretched ahead of her.

How wonderful it was to be able to sit there. Lonely? Yes. Locked with rheumatism? Yes. But secure and radiant in the knowledge that, even as she sat there, hundreds of her pupils were spreading abroad over the world some of the beauty which she had inculcated in them.

Found Fortune's Start in Subway "Gold Mine"

"One day ten years ago," said a western millionaire to a Chicago Herald-Examiner writer, "I stood without a nickel and without the door of a restaurant in San Francisco. I was indulging in an optical feast, gazing at the display of uncooked roasts, chops and steaks, garnished with watercress, and altogether lovely, in the window. The song, or rather its refrain, 'Thou art so near and yet so far,' was whispered to me by the gaunt brownie of hunger.

"Then a prosperous-looking man who was flipping a half dollar in his hand dropped the coin, which tinkled through an iron grate and fell into a subway below. The man gave an almost unconcerned glance in the direction the coin had gone and then went away humming a popular air.

"I always possessed some resource and I was determined to possess that coin. The occasion is what is frequently spoken of as a ground-hog case. I was 'out of meat,' also bread. I spoke to the proprietor of the place. Told him I had dropped a $5 gold piece through the grate and asked if I might go and retrieve it. 'Certainly,' he said, and gave me a hatchet with which I might remove a wooden bar that had been nailed across a door leading from the basement to the opening under the grate.

"There was much litter and dust down there, and in searching for the lost coin I found many others which had been dropped in a similar way. Thus I cleaned up $8 from that prospect drift. The amount supplied me with a place to put the able-bodied appetite which I had concealed about my person. It also gave me an entree to a clean shirt and a proportionate supply of self-esteem and self-reliance.

"I visited men of influence whom I had not been sufficiently courageous to meet in the immediate heretofore, and I have not been seriously insolvent since that day. Thus you may see on what a slender thread oft hangs a chance in life."

Like the Beggar

Melvin Traylor, the Chicago banker, said in New York the day he sailed on the Berengaria:

"One cause of American business success is our American honesty. We weren't so very honest in the past. Our past methods, in fact, compared with our present ones, make us look like the beggar.

"This beggar had been blind for many years, but one day he hustled up to a steady patron, looked him straight in the eye and said:

"'Could ye gimme a dime for a cup o' coffee, boss?'

"'Why,' said the steady patron, 'have you recovered your sight?'

"The beggar nodded.

"'Dog died, ye see,' he explained, 'and not havin' time to train another I had to turn deef and dumb.'"

Immense Floating Dock

At Southampton, England, is said to be the largest floating dock. It is capable of lifting ships with a displacement of 60,000 tons, covers an area of approximately 3¼ acres and has 17,240 tons of steel in its hull. The height of the dock from the bottom of the pontoon to the top deck of the side wall is over 70 feet and the berth in which it is placed has been dredged to a depth of 65 feet. The dock consists of a hollow steel pontoon, or floor, surmounted on each side by hollow steel walls, the whole forming a structure like an enormous letter U.

Friendship Marred by Distance in New York

In New York city it is possible to know an infinite variety of good citizens. You may scrape up an acquaintance with showgirls, professors of applied therapeutics, novelists, pugilists, Hindu swamis, tabloid reporters, toe dancers and captains of South American banana boats. You may even become warm friends of a bibliomaniac or a Hoboken bartender.

But what good will they do you? If you live in the Bronx, your best friends invariably live in Flatbush, and if you live on City island, the boon companions you are just dying to see always reside in Jamaica or Jersey City.

So that if you are projecting an hour's friendly call, you have to travel on the subways two hours; you are mauled by the theater crowd, and manhandled by the downtown warehouse watchmen going uptown to sleep and the uptown swells going downtown to play.

And when you arrive at your friend's house at 10:00 p. m., limp and shopworn, you find, of course, that he has quit waiting for you and has gone to a Rumanian fish house three blocks from your home which you left two hours ago.

Friendship in New York becomes too often a terrific chore. It is far easier to be content with the casual folk you rub against where your business or your thirst takes you. As a rule, therefore, the "people to your taste" are not to your taste in any deeper, spiritual sense, but they simply frequent the same resort or restaurant you do and are tolerable only because they can speak your jargon of art or business and do not attempt to assault you with beer mugs.—Ernest L. Meyer in the Forum and Century.

Man Resided Here 20,000 Years Ago

Life in North America Is Traced to Ice Age.

Pasadena, Calif.—The time man has lived in America was pushed back to at least 20,000 years ago by reports to the American Association for the Advancement of Science here recently.

Archeologists and geologists told how they have read the record written in earth deposits that give strong evidence that highly developed man hunted strange red haired and large clawed ground sloths, primitive horses, buffalos unlike those known to early white men or Indians, and other strange beasts. Man was contemporaneous with these creatures when the last great ice sheet of the glacial age still covered northern United States. That man existed at a time more remote than generally credited is the conclusion of leading authorities, including Dr. H. M. Harrington of the Southwest museum, Dr. Barnum Brown of the American Museum of Natural History, and Dr. Chester Stock of the California Institute of Technology.

Scattered Over America.

Doctor Harrington and Doctor Stock told of explorations of a gypsum cave near the site of Boulder dam in Nevada, where the camp fires, weapons, and torches of early man were found imbedded. They concluded that this early gypsum cave man, still known only from his tools, since none of his bones have been found after two years of excavations, greatly strengthens scientific suspicion that man was widely scattered over America in the last stages of the Ice age. This is a greater age for man in America than most scientists have considered possible heretofore.

At Folsom, N. M., Dr. Barnum Brown found a kill of extinct buffalo made by men using stone weapons that are different from and superior to any hitherto discovered in America. He dated the deposit in which the bones were found as 20,000 years old.

Heat in the Stratosphere.

There is a possibility that instead of man being as ancient as these new discoveries indicate, the extinct animals associated with them existed until more recent times than scientists have proposed. This view was expressed by D. A. S. Bomer of the University of Chicago. A report from Dr. Philip S. Smith of the United States geological survey showed that Alaska in the Ice age was a pleasant place to be, and offered a good reason for primitive man to migrate across the narrow Bering strait from Asia to America.

Just a mere 50 miles above our heads the temperature is between 1,000 and 2,000 degrees Fahrenheit, according to a new theory of the earth's atmosphere presented by Prof. B. Guthenberg of the California Institute of Technology. This extremely hot weather a few miles up comes as the result of Professor Guthenberg's novel theory that the atmosphere is practically the same in composition throughout and not exclusively of helium in some high layers, as other physicists have concluded. Although the temperatures are high in the heights of the stratosphere, the air is very diffuse and thin. Only a rocket could actually penetrate the atmospheric heights to bring back evidence of what actually exists there, Professor Guthenberg said. The shells of a longe range gun used by the Germans in bombarding Paris probably traveled in a highly heated region of thin atmosphere, but since they exploded it is not known how they were affected by the heat that they encountered.

Pittsburgh Population Is Outweighed by Soot

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Approximately 107,272,000 pounds of soot—an amount probably greater than the weight of the entire population of Pittsburgh—falls within the city limits during a year, it has been estimated.

The soot falls at an average rate of 986.5 tons per square mile each year, according to H. B. Meller, head of the bureau of smoke regulation.

This is an average of 157 pounds for each resident of Pittsburgh, it was estimated, with the total probably exceeding the total weight of the population of about 700,000.

Comparative charts show a decrease of about 50 per cent in the sootfall in the downtown district in the past eight years which was attributed to use of central heating plants instead of a large number of individual furnaces.

The 1929-'30 survey shows that less soot fell than in 1923-24 when the previous survey was made, but there still was more than in 1912-13.

17 Lord's Prayers Written on Dime

Albany, N. Y. — Seventeen Lord's Prayers written on space the size of a dime—it sounds impossible, but Joseph S. A. Bertasso lays claim to that distinction. This was accomplished, Bertasso said, only after long practice.

First he was able to write only five Lord's Prayers, which the ordinary person even cannot do. Recently, Bertasso said, he wrote a 16,033 word history of the United States on a postcard.

Appendicitis Puts End to Man's Blood Giving

Buffalo, N. Y.—Joseph E. Lynch, thirty-two, who has donated 101 pints of blood in saving the lives of more than 90 persons, is recovering in a local hospital from an appendicitis operation.

Special Vault Guards Nation's Timepieces

Washington. — A special vault has been built underground at the naval observatory here to house the clocks which keep the nation's time.

It is a vault within a vault. The inner vault is constructed of hollow tile made so that hot water can be run through it in order to keep a standard temperature of 85 degrees. There is an 18-inch air space between the inner vault and the outer one, which is constructed of stone or cement. Both vaults are placed below the frost line.

By the time the new clock vault is in operation the navy hopes to have two more "Shortt" clocks. The clocks now in use have been telling the country what time it is for the past 30 years, and while still in good running order, will not suffer from the augmentation of two new clocks.

Teaching the Parrots to Talk

Peter Jensen, veteran bird trainer of the Luna Park zoo in Los Angeles, has simplified the task of teaching the parrot family to talk. He holds "classes" twice a day in a secluded cage in the zoo, where there are no noises to distract his "pupils." His class usually consists of four or five birds which are seated on a perch that has a phonograph with a loudspeaker at one end.

Wit and Humor

FIRST-HAND KNOWLEDGE

A little girl who had been tearing her doll to pieces during the week attended Sunday school the following Sunday and was asked of what Adam was made.

"Dust," she replied.

"And what was Eve made of?" asked the teacher.

"Sawdust," promptly answered the little miss.

CELTIC LANGUAGES CYMRIC AND GAELIC

Both Irish and Welsh are living languages. They belong to the Celtic group, as English belongs to the Teutonic group. Celtic languages are divided into two sections, the Cymric and the Gaelic. The Irish language, or Gaelic of Ireland, as well as the Scots' Gaelic and Manx come within the latter category, while the Welsh belongs to the Cymric group. The languages within each of these groups resemble one another closely, yet they present many important points of difference. The Welsh has an almost perfectly phonetic spelling, while the Irish spelling is historical and consequently does not give a true picture of its present pronunciation.

Irish (Gaelic of Ireland), which is more than two thousand years old, was perhaps the only language used in Ireland before the introduction of Christianity. Then came Latin, but it did not displace Gaelic. Gaelic remained the language of the people, and the English emigrants to Ireland learned to speak it. But Cromwell's accession to power marked the end of its supremacy: Under his laws the Irish had to become English in speech, thought and religion or become deprived of educational opportunities. The inhabitants of the Pale—a strip of territory on the eastern coast of the island nearest to England—took up English, but those outside of the Pale remained Irish and consequently had fewer educational advantages.

During the last half-century many attempts have been made to restore the ancient Irish language and culture, and Irish is now, under the Free State, the official language, although the English language is equally recognized. The Irish language is a compulsory subject in the schools, the Gaelic league carries on the work of teaching adults, and many other organizations endeavor to establish the habit of speaking Irish so that it may permeate every aspect of social life. But it has not yet reached the dail or the senate; Irish is rarely, if ever, spoken in either of these two houses.

Welsh is the nearest sister tongue to Gaelic, and over a short stretch of sea is spoken by perhaps a million people. It is the language of church and chapel and produces a large crop of prose and poetry. It is the mother tongue of Lloyd George.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Lake Superior Relic of Ice and Glacial Ages

Lake Superior is now the shrunken reminder of a large Lake Algonquin that was left in the same area by the melting ice of the great Ice ages, it has been proved by excavations for a dam of the Algoma District Power company, on the Michipicoten river that empties into northeastern Lake Superior.

Dr. E. E. Moore, geologist of the University of Toronto, told the Royal Society of Canada that his examination of this engineering work confirms the idea that there was a much larger prehistoric lake filling the Superior basin. As he followed the ups and downs of the geological history of this most northern of the Great Lakes, Doctor Moore found also that during the glacial era there was a smaller lake where Lake Superior now lies.

Desperate

The borrowing habit is not confined to the United States by any means. They actually do it in dear old London and are not in the least particular whom they borrow from.

One of the big London daily papers carries a classified advertising section, somewhat similar to the Times "personals" in which English people of high and low degree air their troubles. It was in this column that the following ad recently appeared:

"Will the persons who have borrowed Waverly Novels No 5, and Les Miserables Vol. I from Clivenden library, kindly return same to Viscountess Astor, M. P."

One mentions in passing that the M. P. after Lady Astor's name does not stand for motion pictures nor mounted police, but member of parliament.

Sleeps During an Oepration

For many years medical men have been searching for new anesthetics as complete in their effects of deadening sensation, but more free from the possibility of undesirable consequences. A wonderful new anesthetic called avertin is proving successful. Avertin is given internally, and the patient simply falls into a deep sleep. He may be roused sufficiently to answer questions or even to converse on a subject, but he feels no pain. Avertin has no adverse effects upon the lungs. On regaining consciousness, the patient breathes quite normally.

Double Your Pep

Why go on feeling "all in"—worn out and "run-down"—when you ought to be as hearty and as happy as a youngster!

The valuable elements in Fellows' Syrup restore what Nature demands. You quickly gain new strength and stamina—new vitality and vigor—new interest in living.

You feel the mental and physical "pick-up" after the first few doses of this wonderful tonic. It improves appetite—banishes "nerves." Be sure to ask the druggist for the genuine Fellows' Syrup, prescribed by doctors all over the world.

FELLOWS' SYRUP

Hungry

Max Cohen, the celebrated North Hollywood artist and fisherman, went after trout the day the season opened and took the family with him They camped in a lonely spot known only to Max and two or three million other anglers and in the middle of the night Buddy started an uproar.

"Be quiet, Buddy," called Max, "you're too big a boy to be afraid. Always remember that after dark the angels are with you."

"Yeah, I know it," said Buddy, "but they're biting me."

Writing Fluid

"Does wine bring inspiration?"

"I don't think so. The best poems come from the ink bottle."

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water every morning before breakfast—an 85 cent bottle lasts 4 weeks—you can get Kruschen at any drug store in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back.

Human Interchange

"Hiram," said Mrs. Corntossel, "what is the new hired man complaining about?"

"He isn't really complainin'," replied Farmer Corntossel. "Talkin' about his troubles is just a hired man's way of bein' sociable and friendly."

Clever Boy Scouts

A mechanical man that walks, sits down, lifts objects, winks his eyes and smokes cigarettes has been built by Newton (Mass.) Boy Scouts. The robot was constructed in the cellar of the home of Robert Kangott, sixteen.

No Cause for Alarm

Elsie—"Gee, what a tough lookin' waiter." Jake—"Don't worry, kid. I can foot the bill."

"What's this guy offering?"

"Something for nothing."

"How much down?"

Finish

"Your husband doesn't yawp about his first sweetheart any more."

"Nope, he saw her the other day, after twenty years."

A cheap pun spoils the next paragraph, even if the latter happens to be a good one.

Better Pay Up!

An old hardened criminal in the Minnesota State Prison was asked recently what was the first step that led to his ruin, and he answered: "The first step that led to my downfall was cheating an editor out of two years subscription. When I had done that the devil had such a grip on me that I could not shake him off."

We are not printing this because we need money, but for your own sake we don't want to see any of our subscribers in the same plight as that fellow. If you should owe some paper it might be well to pay up before such a thing does happen to you.--Tioga Gazette.

Pity the Poor Newspaper Man

It is reported that one of our fastidious newly-married ladies kneads dough with her gloves on. The incident may be somewhat peculiar, but there are others.

Our Boss needs "dough" with his shoes on; he needs dough with his shirt on; he needs dough with his pants on; and unless some of our delinquent subscribers pay before long, the Boss will need dough without a damned thing on, and this is no Garden of Eden in the winter time.--Ex.

Symposium on Hard Times

Death of Mr. Wheat

Mr. Bread Wheat died at the family residence, known as the "pit", after a lingering illness attributed to over-exposure in Washington to a dreadful disease fatal to business, known as Hoover's Farm Relief.

Mr. Wheat was born in the year of Joseph, B. C., and survived the panics and depressions of all ages only to be stricken down in the year of "30" ['slutt' in newspaper language]; lived an honorable and upright life before God and man, serving with unfailing zeal, faith and confidence the human race for more than 6,000 years, without regard to race, creed or color. A friend and faithful servant in war as in peace, the farmer's best friend; he stood for upright, honorable, sound, logical and reasonable business methods. A devout believer in and exponent of free and unrestricted commerce between the nations and individuals, based upon intelligent thinking and honorable practices.

Mr. Wheat is survived by three grandsons, Doubt, Guess and Gamble, a legally adopted stepson, Hoover's Farm Board, who was constantly at his bedside during the last days and is now sitting up with the corpse; two daughters-in-law survive him, who were with him constantly when he was exposed to this dreaded and fatal business disease known as Hoover's Farm Relief, also called Stabilization—Mrs. Broken Down Crops and Mrs. Peanut Politician.

The death of this honorable character is a distinct loss to the economic world, he being one of the most faithful and responsible servants.

Services will be conducted by the Rev. Alexander Legge and the body will lie in state for public inspection between the hours of 9.30 a. m. and 1.15 p.m. each business day until the remains can be smelled as far east as Washington.

Burial—if any — will be in the campaign of 1932, and the honorary pallbearers will be selected by the president of the Farm Board.

By request, no flowers; donate the proceeds to the relief of some worthy farmer, the most of whom have been relieved of everything in God's great garden except his taxes and the right of free air.—Webster (Nebraska) Journal.

To Dedicate Restored Dock

That the restoration of the old dock built in the eighteenth century by the Northwest Company at Grand Portage is now complete has been announced by Mr. Newton J. Bray, president of the Cook County Historical society, which has had charge of the work of restoration. The dock was used originally by the company in its fur-trading activities in the upper Northwest, for which Grand Portage was the entrepot.

The dedication of the restored dock will take place on August 22 in connection with the celebration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the arrival at Grand Portage of the French explorer, La Verendrye. Mr. Edward C. Gale and Miss Francis Andrews, both of Minneapolis and both members of the committee that has financed the work of restoration for the Cook County society, will speak. The dedication will precede an elaborate "La Verendrye" program.

1931 Farmer's Prayer

Lord, I am only a farmer. Thou knowest that when wheat was $2 per bushel and I had flour and sugar in the house and cakes and pies and everything I wanted, I wes not satisfied - I voted for a change for Hoover. Thou knowest that I wore a Hoover badge and was faithful in all things to the G.O.P. Even so! Thou knowest that I believed in the dawn of a new day.

That wool would advance in price, that I would get $3 for wheat and 20c for pork.

Lord, two years have gone never to return-I am too poor to buy necessities—and I still wear the Hoover badge in the seat of my overalls.

Oh Lord, I am thankful for one thing—that Hoover has been able to make the jack-rabbit taste good in the summer time. I pray that Thou wilst keep the rabbits replenished so that I shall not go hungry, and that I may use the hides for clothing.

I am glad, O Lord, that Thou hast proposed the great trucking systems, and that they and also the railroads have been able to keep their high freight rates and my corn will not pay the expense of husking.

I pray that Thou wilst continue to uphold Wall Street, that Big Business will be able to collect the year's interest on the funds of my own bank account, for it is a righteous cause. Teach me to pray:

Our father, who art in Washington, Hoover be thy name; his kingdom come, his will be done, even to deny drought sufferers relief and beating the soldier boys out of their bonus. Give us each our daily corn bread that Hoover tried to make us eat for two years and Harding had us eating in three months. Lead us not into temptation to vote for a democratic president. For Hoover has all the power, Wall Street all the money, Rockefeller the oil, the manufacturers all the protection, and I have the patched overalls for ever and ever. Amen! —Ex.

Minutes of School Meeting

Minutes of the Special School Meeting held Aug. 17, 1931.

All members present.

Moved by Fricker and seconded by Sanoden, that C. O. Saastad be given the contract to drive Bus on Route No. 3 at $33.50 per month. Motion carried.

Moved by Fricker and seconded by Theo. Ness that we draw lots on tie bids on Route No. 1 and Route No. 2. Motion carried.

Nils Ness was drawn to drive Bus on Route No. 1 at $40.00 per month. Marvin Sandberg was drawn to drive Bus on Route No. 2 at $35.00 per month.

Moved by Ness and seconded by O. Nohre that all Bus drivers have their contracts executed and have their Bondsmen approved by the board of Education not later than Aug. 24th, 1931. Motion carried. Moved by Sanoden and seconded by Ness that meeting be adjourned. Motion carried.

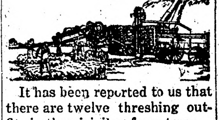
G. Sanoden, Dist. Clerk.

Several auto loads of fellows from both town and country motored out to the S. H. Nohre home on Tuesday evening where they charivaried Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Horien.

Chest Clinic

A free chest clinic for adults and children will be conducted by Dr. B. C. Bernard of Oakland Park Sanitorium, Thief River Falls, in the Holt Public School on Saturday morning, August 22, (tomorrow) from 9.00 to 11.30 a. m. Funds for defraying expenses of this clinic are furnished by Christmas Seal Sales and State and County appropriations.

The Tuberculin Skin Test will be given free of charge to all children of school age. This test is valuable in diagnosing childhood tuberculosis, as it will tell in 48 hours whether or not a child has the tuberculosis germ in his body. Come Early!



It has been reported to us that there are twelve threshing outfits in the vicinity of our town.

Bus Drivers Are Hired

At a special meeting held on Monday this week the local school board of Dist. No 35 hired the following bus drivers.

On route 1, Nils Ness for $40 per month.

On route 2, Marvin Sandberg for $35 per month.

On route 3, C. O. Saastad for $33.50 per month.

This is a drastic cut in the bus drivers wages, being $30.50 less per month or $274.50 per year less than last year.

The board also cut the wages of the Janitor $15 per month for the coming year.

Naturally this saving will help greatly in taking care of bond issues that are coming due.

The school board is trimming expenses as closely as possible, to keep down the tax rate and at the same time retire some of the outstanding bonds so as to cut out the interest.

Twelve bids were received for the three routes and, on No. 1 and 2 the lowest bidders tied for the jobs and lots had to be drawn in order to settle the matter.

Village Band Is Organized

About twenty-five local boys from the country and from town met at the Community Hall on Tuesday evening and organized a Band. The following officers were elected: Rev. L. M. Redal, president and director; Einar Loven, O. E. Sovde and Percy Sorter as a board of three directors to assist with the work of organizing and running the new institution, and E. A. Enger secretary-treasurer.

With such an enthusiastic and willing bunch as met up for the first meeting, we believe that as the thing gets going we may have an organization of about forty or more members. A Band is one of the finest organizations that any town can sponsor and we hope that every one will do their part in cooperating with the instructor and supervisors to make it a success.

The next meeting of the organization will be held Tuesday evening, September 1st. Those who were not at the first meeting but, wish to join the band, should come in then and get lined up as it will then be decided how many various instruments will be needed.

Several of the boys have had band practice in the years past, and about twelve of them still have their instruments.

Robbers Kidnap Sheriff

Two unmasked bandits robbed the Farmers State Bank down at Winger in Polk county on Saturday and got away with $2,775 in cold cash. They used a small but fast car in their business and have not as yet been found.

Two men believed to be the two bandits drove into Thief River Falls the same day and kidnapped Sheriff Ole Ihle of Pennington county on the streets of that city and took him towards St. Hilaire on the highway several miles from the city before they released him. A posse was formed and the kidnappers were traced to a small inland town north of Oklee where all trace of them was lost.

"He accepted the challenge to fight another Turk. They crashed together and splintered their lances. They drew pistols and fired. A bullet rang on Smith's breastplate and glanced off. Smith's bullet tore into the left arm o' the Turk, who could no longer control his horse. Soon he fell faint and stunned. Smith cut off his head.

"The Turks demanded another fight. It came the next day when Smith fought a giant with battle axes.

"Our captain lost his ax and was nearly outdone. His horsemanship saved him until with his falchion he ran the Turk through.

"When we were defeated in battle he was wounded and lay a night with the slaughtered dead. He recovered, was taken to Axopolis and put on the auction block. He were kicked and handled and felt over like a horse and sold to the highest bidder. He went to a bashaw in Nalbrits. When the bashaw had nothin' else to do he'd kick Smith. It was his only amusement. He kicked once too often. They was alone in a barn where Smith was threshin' with a flail. Smith broke the bashaw's neck and ran away. There's a man for ye—credit to the blood in his veins! He had a rough hand in war, but in peace he were gentle as a dove. He never sored his lungs sighin'. He got back to London where we met and shipped together for the New world. Don't worry, boy, ye're born under a lucky star. Be a man like John Smith. There's the quirk that wins."

From that time on the young man was in better heart.

Old Achawat was as strong and tireless with his paddle as the younger men. There were long carries where the slanting water was rough as the sea in a storm. Clouds came out of the west and as night was falling on a long carry black clouds came over split with fiery flashes and roaring with thunder. The party halted and began to prepare for rain.

"The great bird!" Achawat exclaimed, pointing upward. In a curious dialect he asked the white men if they would some time get him a little thunder bird. He would be afraid of a big one but he thought that a little one would be a better friend than a dog.

The red men were busy girdling great spruces and, with sharpened pole-ends, stripping off cylinders of bark about five feet long. Soon every man had a water-proof arch of bark to cover him for the night. Being on high ground under thick foliage one needed only a blanket to be fairly well protected from the weather.

Next evening they reached the big camp on the island just off the Canadian shore. In the midst of it a great fire was burning and the red men were dancing around it, their bodies bent, their heads lowered like the head of a charging bull, their arms moving as if they were kneading dough, while hoarse grunts and weird cries came from their lips.

Achawat took them to the tent of Father Cauvet who was talking with a chief of the tribe. He read Robert's letter in the firelight. He shook their hands, saying:

"I could welcome you with a better heart if Satan were not in possession of the camp. Some warriors came in today with an Iroquois captive and we are in the midst of a Witches' Sabbath. The girls and women have been torturing the poor creature with their teeth and presently he will be burned till he is dead and boiled in a kettle and eaten. We would better go to the far end of the island for the night than stay here and listen to his death song and the yelling of his tormentors. It would be like looking into hell."

They gathered up their blankets.

"Achawat, you came with us," the Father commanded, as they went away in the darkness of the greenwood to the west shore of the island, followed by the Indian. Even there the horrors and the deviltry came faintly to their ears—the high treble of the death song, the shouting and the wild laughter.

The young man groaned as he heard it.

"Boy, it is a message good for the soul of you," said the priest. "Do you not realize how hard has been the struggle of our fathers, in ages gone, to put Satan down and how great is the blessing of industry and government? These wild folk are like the wolves, the lynxes and the catamounts of the forest always seeking prey. Then even eat rats and mice, as do the cat family, but they are more cruel than the beasts, because Satan is in them."

They slept little and arose soon after daylight. Achawat had left them in the night and gone back to his people.

"He could not keep away," said the Father. "We shall find him lying with the others, their bodies full of flesh, in a drunken stupor."

"I should think these swine unworthy of the sacrifice that you are making," Robert remarked.

The Father answered: "They are swine, and yet they are men. Their fortitude is heroic. Their patience is sublime. They are hospitable to all save an enemy. They have keen intellects and sometimes an eloquence that is moving. They ask: If God made heaven and earth where was God before heaven and earth were created?' They ask many questions which we cannot answer."

They returned to the camp. It was silent. The fire had burned low. Achawat was lying with the others under a rude bark-covered shed alongside the smoldering embers. It was a strange mingle of dogs and bare bodies. The girls and women and young ones, who always get out of the way when a feast is on, as the Father explained, had returned to camp and were eating together before a fire some ten yards aside. Their favorite dogs were with them. As they ate they wiped the grease from their hands on the hair of the dogs. They made the white men welcome, who sat down among them and ate dried fish and moose and blueberries. "Their heaven is paved with blueberries," the Father explained as they began eating.

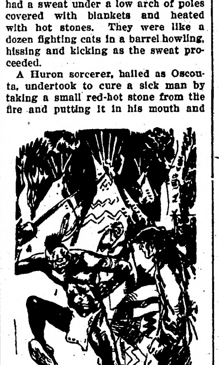
The meat was well cured but was filled with surprises, for a quantity of hair, dirt and twigs had been beaten into it.

In the four days that the Englishmen spent with these nomads of the waste they saw a life so strange and revolting that only a small part of it may be here recorded—children three years old still nursing at their mothers' breasts, women giving birth to children without help or the slightest outcry and the same day going on with their work of building cabins for the winter, while the men were asleep by the fire. The girls could not be distinguished from the young men save for their double girdles at the middle and below the breasts, and their beads and earrings.

A band of scouts from the forests south of the river came into camp one evening and reported that they could find no Iroquois south of the great river. The Englishmen were told that their journey would begin at daylight in the morning. A band of the friendly Hurons arrived that evening.

The sorcerers began their work. The devil killer borrowed Robert's sword and began howling and hissing and slashing the air so furiously that the sweat poured down from his brow to his feet. With wild yells he redoubled his efforts and at last pretended to see and exterminate the accursed one. Some of the warriors had a sweat under a low arch of poles covered with blankets and heated with hot stones. They were like a dozen fighting cats in a barrel howling, hissing and kicking as the sweat proceeded.

A Huron sorcerer, hailed as Oscouta, undertook to cure a sick man by taking a small red-hot stone from the fire and putting it in his mouth and hissing and growling in the face of the invalid as he blew out his breath. Later he showed his mouth to the white men, who could see no evidence of burning. Father Cauvet explained that the savages have a mysterious art in evading the effect of heat. He had seen a woman walk through red fire apparently unscathed.



With Wild Yells He Redoubled His Efforts and at Last Pretended to See and Exterminate the Accursed One.

He told them that the sick man would be left to die alone if he were unable to walk when the camp moved.

Robert and Amos set out with a band of twenty braves in the morning. The Indians' otter skins were stored in a big water-proof sack of moose hide. They reached the outlet of the great lake, but the Dutch trader had not yet arrived. The braves began to make a rude shelter when they heard a tapping in the near forest like that of a clape. It frightened them. They ceased their work. One of them tapped on a tree.

It was part of a system of mystic signals known to these children of the forest. In a moment an Algonquin scout hurried into their presence with whispered explanations. It was like shouting at a herd of deer. What a scurry of greased bodies! What a splashing as the braves sprang for their canoes, the scout among them! In a few seconds the whole fleet was out in deep water and speeding away. Their expertness in boarding their moving water steeds astonished the white men. It was, doubtless, the result of much training in the art of getting away. There was no crossing of purposes, no confusion. Every man knew his place and went to it.

"They can move quicker than a cat before a bulldog. Ye git one o' them lazy pups skeered an' he can travel for God's sake." Amos whispered. "I don't blame 'em. It's poor fun to be burned alive and cooked. There's a big band o' Iroquois near us—you can bet on that. Hell's kettles!"

A flight of arrows hissed out of the edge of the forest near them and fell in and around the last canoes of the fleet. One struck the arm of a brave and clung there waving as he bent to his task. Another was imbedded in the bare back of the stern paddler in the last canoe. While Robert looked he saw a red line stream down below the arrow. Still the wounded men held their pace with no apparent lessening of their energy and courage. In a moment ten canoes filled with Iroquois warriors had taken water and in pursuit of the fleeing northmen.

"Now by the hazard o' the spotted die! I reckon we got to go to some other place about as rapid as our nags can carry us," said Amos.

In their haste the Algonquins had left their sack of skins and a much smaller one half-filled with dried meat. Amos hauled out an armful of fur and stuffed it into the meat sack. He slung the burden over his shoulder.

"'Now goodby, mother, dear! for I'm a goin' away,'" he quoted as he beckoned to his comrade.

They waded and climbed over dead timber at the edge of the small river for some twenty rods where they went ashore and hurried southward, keeping their pace until darkness fell upon them. At a noisy brook they drank and ate and lay down for the night.

"My God!" Amos exclaimed with a laugh. "Them netops went as quick as a ghost at cockcrow."

"I never saw a scared cat move quicker," Robert answered.

"We made a monstrous quick move ourselves," said Amos. "My nags is tired."

"So are mine."

They were up at daybreak and continued their journey, browsing on fish and flesh as they walked. They bore southeastward and, after a tedious and uneventful journey, came to a well-trod path going due west.

"This is an Indian path," Amos whispered. "I reckon the lake is near."

They proceeded with great caution. Soon Amos said: "There's been no man travel on this path for days. A moose and two deer went over it last night. We'll spur our nags and push along faster."

Coming to the top of a hill they could see the broad sunlit waters below them. There Amos climbed a tree and satisfied himself that the coast was clear. A mile or so out he saw a shallop with a full sail heading southward. There was no other sign of life on the water or along the shore. The sun was about two hours high in the east.

Amos descended and they hurried on to a sheltered cove and a sloping sand beach. On a flat rock near the water were the dying remnants of a campfire. There were tracks in the sand.

"Some fine lady has been here this mornin'," said Amos. "Look at that little shoe print. I reckon they camped here last night. I seen their shallop headin' south. It's a place where the savages when they are in these parts come down to trade with the Dutch."

In a moment Robert saw a white handkerchief hanging over the water on a dead branch. He pulled the branch toward him, released the handkerchief and examined it.

"Od's blood!" he exclaimed. "This is Peggy Weld's handkerchief. The odor of roses! I always observed that when I was near her and here are the embroidered initials 'P. W.'"

"Jerusalem, the golden!" Amos answered. "We missed 'em by less than sixty minutes. Never mind, boy, Amos is happy. We'll tag along after 'em with a shallop of our own afore midday."

"What do you mean?" Robert asked with a look of distress in his animated face.

"I swear by the dew claws o' the devil, we're in luck," said Amos.

He pointed at a great hemlock which, leaning from the lakes' edge, had lately fallen into the water. It was hollow at the butt. A spread of its green branches protruded from the lake surface as high as a haystack.

"What's in your mind?" Robert asked.

"A contrivance! I reckon it will save our legs and keep us out o' the pot a day or two. This is a highway o' Satan. An Englishman with his white carcass has got to be careful of it in these parts. Ye shin up a tree and keep watch. If ye see or hear anybody, rap thrice like a clape. The time has come when I must take a chance, as the lady said when she got married."

Odd Oriental Tastes

Koreans, like many Orientals, live mostly on rice. They cook their seaweed in oil and serve it with slices of red peppers. Kimshee, a kind of sauerkraut, is a favorite Korean dish.

To the north, the natives of Kamchatka relish the tongues and the marrow of the bones of reindeer, but the piece-de-resistance is the meat of unborn fawns. From the stomach of the reindeer the natives obtain their greens—half-digested balls of moss. A delectable native dish is reindeer sausage which has been surrounded by dough and dropped in boiling water. Boiled fish eggs are considered a delicacy.—Exchange.

WORLD WAR YARNS

by Lieut. Frank E. Hagan

"Gone West"

Two outstanding contributions to current speech were made by the British soldiers during the World war. One was "Blighty" and the other was "Gone West." "Blighty" was derived from an East Indian word meaning "over the sea" or "home" and was probably brought to the battlefields of France by veterans who had served in India. So when a "Tommy" was wounded, he accepted his wound philosophically as a "ticket to Blighty." The term was also used as a synonym for "leave of absence."

The American soldiers did not readily pick up "Blighty" from their British comrades in arms. Perhaps the difference between a 3,000-mile trip across the Atlantic and the short passage across the English channel accounts for the fact that "Blighty" didn't figure much in the life of the average Yank. But he did take over the expression "Gone West" as a synonym for death.

There are various theories as to the origin of this expression. It was a common phrase in South Africa at the beginning of the present century and it was probably taken to England by British soldiers who had served in the Boer war and then carried to France. But the idea goes back much farther than that. Thousands of years ago the Egyptians spoke of their dead as those who had "Gone West" and among many primitive peoples, including the North American Indians, there was a belief that the abode of the dead was in the west, the land of the setting sun.

He Died for Love of a Spy

He was a cadet at the aviation center of Issoudun. His brother birdmen called him Jerry O. which, for the purposes of this story, is near enough to his real name. He made love to every welfare girl he ever met—this upon the word of one of them who is the authority for this story—that is, until Marie came to Issoudun. Marie was a barmaid, the sister of a man who gave French lessons to the officers at the flying camp. After he saw Marie, he couldn't "see" any other girl.

Their romance flourished for awhile. And then—Marie was arrested. French counter espionage officers revealed the fact that she was a German spy. They questioned her and Jerry was involved. He hadn't betrayed any secrets, for he didn't know any to betray. But the upshot of it was that he was removed from flying lists and confined to quarters. There he brooded—over the disgrace that had come upon him, and over the deception by his sweetheart.

Eventually he was restored to his former status and put back on the flying lists. But he made only one flight after that. As his buddies watched him circling around for a landing they saw that he had apparently lost control and from a height of about 1,000 meters his plane dived straight for the ground. The ground officers who investigated crashes made their examination and turned in a report of accident. But that didn't deceive his brother flyers. They knew that he was too good a pilot to dive a thousand meters at the ground—accidentally.

Today a white cross stands in the graveyard at Issoudun. It bears the name of Jerry. The welfare girl who tells this story visited it a year or so after the war. On it she saw a huge wreath of imitation green leaves and bead designs done in the usual French manner. There was a sun-faded card on the wreath. It read: "For the grave of Lieut. Jerry O. From his great friend Marie M." Yes, Marie had been released from prison when the war was over and she had returned to Issoudun long enough to decorate Jerry's grave. And that's the end of this story of Jerry O., American aviator, and Marie M. French, barmaid and German spy.

When Wilson Went Home

President Wilson departed from France the early afternoon of June 29, 1919, in striking contrast to the exciting scenes which had marked his his reception a few weeks before. A typical Brest day of drizzling, interminable rain and oceans of mud, greeted the President when he arrived in the forenoon at the French embarkation center on his special train.

The George Washington, transport on which the President made his eastward voyage, waited in the outer harbor. Only a detachment of M. P.'s were present as Mr. Wilson rode out to the vessel. No doughboy guards were lined up as on the previous occasion when he debarked.

Non-coms of the Forty-first division, who had served as an honor guard at the President's mansion in Paris, the Fifth Engineers and the One Hundred and Forty-sixth Machine Gun battalion were aboard the George Washington when she sailed for home.

These men had barely completed their midday chow when the historic George Washington whistled her farewell to France and, with the President, headed west.

So inconspicuous was the departure that many American soldiers in the French port were unaware that day that their commander in chief had sailed for home.

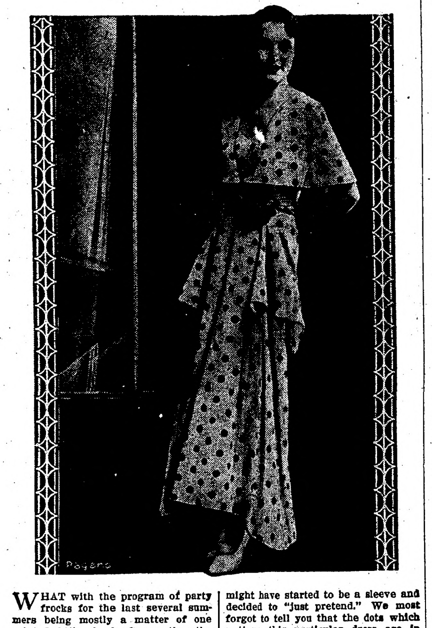
Dotted Net Is Charming and Chic

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



WHAT with the program of party frocks for the last several summers being mostly a matter of one printed chiffon frock after another, the idea of printed or embroidered cotton net suggests a most intriguing diversion.

The beauty about these very charming new quality-kind cotton nets which are now so smartly in fashion for evening wear is that they can be safely and successfully washed—no danger of colors "running" as heretofore. Then, too, these nets drape ever so charmingly, at the same time having enough body in them to stay crisp and fresh looking on the warmest evening.

Very newest printed nets carry the message that dots have appeared on fashion's horizon for midsummer evenings. For the slender woman the dress pictured is ideal. It is a very "young" frock for slim and svelte youth, and later providing you're the type.

A particularly summery and actually washable durene cotton net fashions this lovely gown. Of course, you will be interested in the deep capelet collar which reminds us that shoulders are generally covered this summer if only with a wisp of a scarf, or a tiny drapery which looks as if it might have started to be a sleeve and decided to "just pretend." We most forgot to tell you that the dots which pattern this particular dress are in "English Officer" red, from which striking color the hand-made silk apples, which form the corsage take their cue. A slightly stiffened peplum is featured, its hemline following the contour of the skirt hemline with considerable artistry.

Quite as effective, although not so unusual and new as the big coin dots are the charming nets which are patterned with colorful florals. These tune in every key from flamboyant rose motifs to demure Dolly Varden flowerettes.

You may have quite a time deciding whether to buy a printed or an embroidered net for your next evening or garden-party frock. Choose either and you will play safe. The inspiring thought in this connection is that through perfected processes these fine quality durened nets no matter how delicate their tones and tints may be or how bold, they may be relied on as being fast color. This means they are not only appealing from an esthetic point of view, but they are also thoroughly practical.

HATS OF ALL SIZES APPROVED BY PARIS

There is nothing monotonous about hat fashions this summer. Sizes range from mere skull caps to cape lines, with brims a foot wide. There is as much variety in shapes as in sizes and more materials involved than there is room to list. Soft, fabriclike straws, crocheted or mesh straws are being used for new versions of the beret, and to make crowns for some of the brimmed hats. The familiar panama, baku, milan, leghorn and other well knowns are making all manner of brimmed hats. Stitching is used to give body to cotton and linen hats and to decorate brimmed sports hats of jersey and felt.

Among the small hats Agnes' French colonial creations and Suzanne Talbot's derby-brimmed hats are of particular interest. Agnes has taken the various headgears and hair dresses of the Moroccans, the Algerians, the Cambodians and translated them in a collection of peaked and wrapped and draped turbans and berets that are enormously smart. Furthermore, she has taken over the brilliant and exotic colorings that distinguish the original models.

Mesh Stockings Regarded Comfortable for Sports

Do you like lisle for sports stockings? Many women do, because it looks less dressed up and formal. Do you like mesh for sports stockings? Its open work seems next most comfortable to bare legs. Lisle and mesh conspire, therefore, to make comfortable, good looking stockings to go with sports costumes. And lisle mesh socks are a joy for tennis.

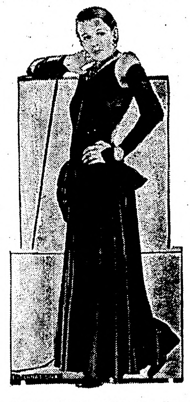
Socks continue to be worn for active sports, but usually over stockings. Bare legs may be worn for comfort, but only in private and informal places.

With the white clothes and the bright colors you will be wearing this summer you will find that a light clear beige is most becoming. This is the shade that tones best with your outdoor-darkened skin.

Women at Palm Beach adopted this shade almost universally in the daytime. In the evening they wore paler tones—nude and peach.

There is talk of white and off-white hose for wear in the evening.

Stunning Dinner Gown



This is a Lanvin replica of a dinner gown in black. The braided peplum is unique, as are the long satin gauntlets with jeweled bracelets.

Three Colors for Scarf; Worn With White Sports

There are all sorts of attractive scarfs, many of them made of red, white and blue. There are lots of clothes accessories in those colors, anyway. They are worn with white sports clothes.

There are, for instance, scarfs made in triangles of the three colors, oddly chunked together. There are scarfs of the three colors in wide stripes, others with the center portion of the scarf white, the ends striped red and blue. These scarfs, striped and triangles, are made of the finest wool crocheted in a loose, lacy stitch.

Other scarfs are made of the three colors striped lengthwise, in soft silk crepe. Still others are made of two colors on one side, lined with the third color.

NATIVE CUNNING OF FOXES AND WOLVES

Classed by Hunters as Wiser Than Other Denizens of the Woods.

Which is superior in wit and cunning, the fox, famous since Biblical times, or the wolf, who was known well in the days of ancient Rome and, no doubt, even earlier in history?

While not pretending to settle the long-mooted question, John A. Hope, in an article published in the American Forests and Forest Life, tells of his personal experiences with both animals, leaving the reader to decide for himself.

Mr. Hope has known the fox since boyhood and the timber wolf for some forty years in the forests and mountains of Canada. Both, he says, are gifted with a more acutely intelligent cunning in self-preservation than any other species of wild life, with the exception of the brown Asiatic rat.

Each animal, however, depends for safety upon widely divergent phases of woods strategy, Mr. Hope points out, and the individual must judge for himself in which phase of woodcraft the most cunning is displayed under all conditions, toward first prize.

"A wolf invariably fights shy of steel traps, dead falls, poisoned bait and other instruments set for his capture, and generally successfully," Mr. Hope states, "even though no human taint be present. Nor will he, as a rule, cross or run along a snowshoe trail made by a human, even when this trail cuts between him and a previous kill he is anxious to dine off in the dark hours. Knowing that this track is foreign to his territory, his native cunning comes into play. He is seldom seen in the daytime and a sixth sense seems to warn him always of unseen danger.

"I have seen scores of foxes by daylight," Mr. Hope continues, "and have even picked off many with a rifle, without their seeing me or even knowing whence death came. The fox I have caught within twenty hours in steel traps set with bare hands and covered with dry grass, moss, or earth, in temperate weather—no bait used. The same conditions apply to poisoned bait. And a fox will not hesitate to run along tracks by snowshoes or prints made by boots."

On the other hand, it is pointed out, a wolf depends upon speed and endurance to evade capture, and if in danger of capture at the end of a run, will turn and fight with savage courage. Few dogs, in a no-quarter fight, come off victorious. The fox, instead of depending upon speed and endurance relies upon its wits.

"From the moment a dog picks up its scent," Mr. Hope writes, "the fox utilizes every bit of cover on its run for life, to twist and turn, out-flank and break back, head for a lake or river, paddling miles up and down stream, if necessary, to throw hounds off its scent—and do it successfully nine times out of ten. It will dodge into badger earths and burrows, caves and hollow trees and even jump into the limbs of thickly branched trees, springing from one branch to another. Overhauled, it, too, will fight hard for its life, but being smaller than any domestic dog as fast as itself, it is invariably killed."

Turks Shaken in Their Veneration for Koran

Arabic, being a sacred language, the ecclesiastics have cried out against their holy book, the Koran, appearing in any other tongue. But the Turkish government has in spite of this allowed the publication of three separate translations. Fourteen thousand copies have been sold. Turks, who formerly heard the sounding Arabic of the Koran without understanding anything of its meaning, imagined it charged with tremendous and mystic meanings. That impression melts away when the Koran is read in the vernacular. It is sometimes enough to place a Koran and a Testament in the hands of a Turkish reader and leave him to draw his own conclusions. It is said that Kemal Pasha in disgust threw the book across the room into a corner. Yet in the Sudan the primary textbook in all the government schools is the Koran, and Islam is gaining ground constantly in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. — Sunday School Times.

Gave Sound Reason for Multiplicity of Wives

Maurice Hindus, the Russian authority, was talking about his experiences in Russia.

"In Russia the unrestricted divorce law is abused," he said. "Its abusers don't think so, though."

"I lunched one day in Moscow with a commissar who had already had 14 wives, and he was only twenty-nine years old.

"He said it was to his wives that he owed his success, so naturally the more wives the merrier. He said without his wives' counsel and support he'd still have been a shoemaker's apprentice.

"Then he wound up with an epigram.

"'The born leaders of men,' he said, 'are women.'"

Electric Eye Aids Blind

"Electric eyes now are being used to "see" for blind persons in guiding them about their homes by giving them a sense of direction as they move about. The electric eye, or protoelectric cell, is made up like a flashlight with a small buzzer connected to its battery, according to Popular Mechanics Magazine. Convenient electric lights are then placed about passages and hallways, particularly at turns.

The blind person turns the electric eye about much as a person having his sight would direct a flashlight. When the device points to a light source, contact is made and the buzzer sounds. As long as the buzzer is sounding the blind user knows he is on the right path.

CAR OWNERS bought more Firestone Tires during May, June and July than in any like period in History

THERE are reasons for this—Firestone is building the Greatest Tire Values in history, with the result that Firestone Factories are operating 24 hours a day, 6 days a week, to meet public preference.

This is the year everybody is scrutinizing his purchases. This is particularly true in tire buying because of the many confusing and misleading statements made about tires.

To give car owners the facts, Firestone published comparisons showing quality, construction and prices. Then the public went to Firestone Service Stores and Service Dealers—made their own comparisons with cross sections cut from Firestone Tires—and from special brand mail order tires and others.

When they saw the facts, they bought more Firestone Tires during May, June and July than in any like period in Firestone history.

Let the Firestone Service Dealer show you these Firestone Extra Values and have your car equipped for Safe, Trouble-Free Motoring. Drive in today.

World's Greatest State Fair

EXHIBITS recruited from the farms, homes, and industries of the nation will contribute to Minnesota's 72nd, and "World's Greatest" State Fair, September 5 to 12.

Outstanding will be the Livestock Show of 6,000 head of prize animals; the 4-H club demonstrations of 1,200 boys and girls; the bountiful display of farm crops; the 60-acre machinery clinic; the work of women in improving homemaking; the School Exhibits, and the Horse, and Aircraft Shows.

Flights by an autogiro; the exhibit of Chinese torture methods; the Ituri Pygmy

World on Parade

Village; Shooting a man from the mouth of a cannon; horse races; auto races; the great fireworks show The World on Parade, the Johnny J. Jones Exposition are a few of the 1931 entertainment features.

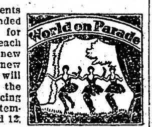
STATE FAIR HAS NEW THRILLERS

Autogiro, Shooting Man from Cannon, Balloon Ascension On the Program.

The entertainment program to be presented at the Minneosta State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, September 5 to 12, will be vast and varied, embracing many new features in addition to those which retain their popularity from year to year.

"World on Parade" not only is the theme of the gigantic outdoor spectacle to be offered before the Grandstand each night, but it epitomizes this year's program from beginning to end, it is announced by Raymond A. Lee, secretary of the Fair.



Speed events are demanded and taken for granted each year, but new names and new aspirants will appear on the auto racing cards September 5, 9 and 12, and new horses will be driven for new records in the harness events September 7, 8, 10 and 11. Purses aggregating $21,000 will attract more than 200 trotters and pacers from far and wide, and eight running races are carded.

State Fair visitors will find a new thrill in the performance of the Autogiro or windmill type of airplane, which will take off at a sharp angle after an amazingly short run immediately in front of the Grandstand, maintain a low flight speed approximating 20 miles an hour, "hover" in midair, then after attaining a surprising cruising speed, descend vertically and more slowly than a parachute jumper.

Another performance of the air, and one which will stir recollections of an earlier day, will be a revival of an old-fashioned balloon ascension, with a parachute jumper cutting loose from the great gas bag and drifting gracefully to earth.

More than a dozen bands and orchestras will furnish State Fair music, among them, Roy D. Smith's Royal Scotch Highlanders Band, world-famous musical organization.

Novelty of setting, scenery and lighting effects and a departure in manner of portrayal will characterize the nightly presentation of "World on Parade," the colorful outdoor spectacle which will close with fireworks replete with surprises.

Gorgeously costumed and headed by a duo of adagio dancers, the Sixteen Abbott Dancers, internationally famous ballet, will appear for a special State Fair engagement. Acrobatic, eccentric and tap dancing will be presented by the English Tivoli Girls. The Wan Wan San Troupe of fourteen of China's greatest contortionists and "wonder workers," Senor Cimijotti's ten dancing horses and twelve master horsemen, Cliff Aeros shooting 90 feet from a monster cannon, high rigging performers, comedy mules and other trained animal acts; everything from clowns to grand opera artists—these are among the many attractions to be offered.

Models of Occidental art treasures, including paintings, costumes, draperies, lanterns and other antiques acquired during many years effort in China will be shown in Madame Mari's exhibit, and the cruel methods of ancient torture will be depicted.

Interest will be attached to the Ituri Pygmy Village over which Chief Eli Elicuium and his wife, Zambezi, of the Belgian Congo preside.

The Evening Horse Show, September 7 to 11, and the second annual Boy Scout Camp and Indian Village will offer new features.

Admission to the State Fair will be 50 cents.

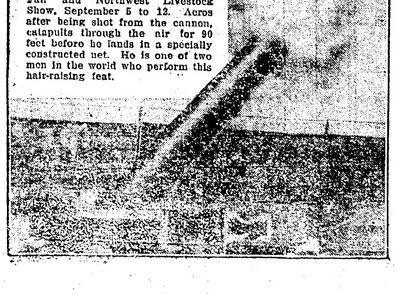
HUMAN CANNON BALL COMING TO STATE FAIR



Cliff Aeros, the human cannon ball, who permits himself to be fired from the barrel of 42-foot gun, will be featured as the premier attraction at the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, September 5 to 12. Aeros after being shot from the cannon, catapults through the air for 90 feet before he lands in a specially constructed net. He is one of two men in the world who perform this hair-raising feat.

Starved Montana Sheep Die After Eating Sweet Clover

Humboldt, Minn.—Nearly 500 sheep, shipped from a big ranch in Montana to Morris Florance at Humboldt for feeding, died near here recently when they were liberated from the stock cars into a field of sweet clover.

Because of the lack of forage in Montana this year, the sheep were nearly starved upon their arrival here, and it is believed that the animals bloated when they got into the rich clover. The report said that the sheep were dropping as if mowed down by a machine gun.

Duck Hunt Season Shortened

Washington, Aug. 25.—(AP)—The hunting season on ducks, whose numbers have been seriously depleted by drouth, was shortened to one month today by a proclamation issued by President Hoover.

The proclamation also applies to geese, brant and coot throughout the United States and Alaska.

Canadian authorities are expected by the biological survey to take similar action soon. The principal breeding grounds in northeastern United States and western and southwestern Canada have been dried up by drouth over the last three years.

In the northern part of the United States the season, under the new regulations, will open October 1 and close October 31.

Death's Parade

....It is not possible for the human mind to comprehend the significance of ten million men and boys killed in the war. All of us have stood in line for hours as we watched some huge procession. No one of us, however, has ever seen a procession of a million men. A parade of ten million soldiers, marching from daylight to dark, ten abreast, with each line only two seconds behind another, would require 46 days to pass a given point.

As ghastly as these figures appear, they do not tell the whole story. Of the 5,983,600 men listed as "prisoners or missing," a considerable percentage were undoubtedly killed in action. It was officially estimated in England that 60 per cent of the missing were probably dead. The estimate in Canada was 56 per cent and in France 40 per cent. If, therefore, half those listed as "prisoners or missing" be presumed to be dead the total death toll is increased by 2,991,800.—Kirby Page, in "War, Its Causes, Consequences and Cure."

Kill the Weeds!

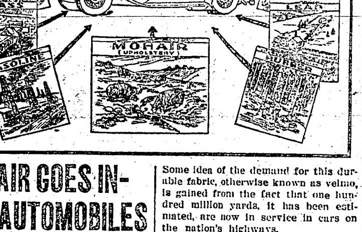
The time is again here when all noxious weeds are matured and the seeds are ripened and already commenced to shell out and blow around. We realize that it may seem foolish to some of you that we start now to talk about killing the weeds, but it is not a dumb idea. To cut them now will leave most of the seeds in the patch where the weeds grew and, when you burn the dead weeds you will destroy the biggest percentage of the foul seeds.

You all know that there is not anything inviting about a big patch of weeds growing near your property, on the vacant lots or along the streets ranging in height from a few inches to several feet. It would at least be a benefit to have the weeds cut so that they would not hold all the snow in big drifts during the winter.

It works the same with the weeds as the grasshoppers. The more you kill this year the less you will have to fight next year. Protect your property by cutting the weeds on your own lots and ask your neighbor to do the same and if there are some lots close by that no one cuts, go out and cut the weeds yourself just for sport. A better idea yet, would be for every man to turn out and cut all the weeds and make our town look clean and snappy.

Don't sit back and say you have nothing to do with it because it is not any weeds near your property or because you have cut your weeds. Be up and among those who want to see it done. To stick right to yourelf and not help once with a thing in a public way, is of no benefit and only shows lack of cooperation. Lets see some action.

AUTOMOBILE LARGEST USER OF SEVEN AMERICAN INDUSTRIES



MOHAIR GOES INTO AUTOMOBILES

Estimate 100,000,000 Yards in Use on Nation's Highways.

TODAY'S automobile is almost entirely an achievement of our natural resources or products. With the exception of rubber which is grown in Africa, India or South America but manufactured in this country, all the basic materials that go to make an automobile are produced in our midst. Steel, mohair, plate glass, nickel and lead are not only American products, but are, together with rubber, used to a greater extent in making cars than for any other purpose.

Practically every state in the Union contributes to these materials, either in their raw state or in their manufacture. For example, our youngest and fastest growing livestock industry, that of angora goats, provides the mohair which is used in making mohair velvet for automobile upholstery. Some idea of the demand for this durable fabric, otherwise known as velmo, is gained from the fact that one hundred million yards, it has been estimated, are now in service in cars on the nation's highways.

These angora or mohair goats, as they are more appropriately called, originally came from Turkey, and the United States imported millions of fleece annually, but with the introduction of the goats into this country, the mohair industry has gradually been transferred here, with a total annual clip of well over seventeen million pounds.

The pile fabric made from this fleece in New England mills is generally accepted as being the ideal material for automobile upholstery because of its long wearing quality, usually outlasting the life of the car itself, because it is easily cleaned and because it affords the greatest riding comfort, all in addition, of course, to its lustrous and beautiful appearance.

Still another commodity of which the automobile industry is its largest consumer is gasoline. Eighty per cent of all gasoline produced in this country, or twelve and a half billion gallons, is used for keeping the nation's twenty-six million motors a-wheel.

Karlstad Creamery Board Here

The board of directors of the Karlstad were here on Sunday evening and had a conference with our creamery board. The Karlstad creamery was destroyed by fire recently and the board was out making a tour to other creameries in this district to get some idea as to what kind of a building they should put up and equipment to install when they rebuild their institution beginning next month.

They left word that Holt had one of the finest and best equipped creameries in this part of the country.

Hottest Part of Day

Is the hottest part of the day the time when the sun is vertically overhead? The strongest rays of the sun occur when the sun is vertically overhead or most nearly so, which is at noon, but the hottest part of the day occurs about 2 p. m. because of the accumulation of heat due to solar radiation throughout the morning hours. —New York Telegram.

Farm Service by a Bank

A farm service department was inaugurated a year ago by a bank in Olympia, Washington, and a farm adviser appointed. Close cooperation has been maintained with the state college extension service. Work in dairying is carried on in conjunction with the Dairy Herd Improvement Association. Also a pasture contest was held in cooperation with the four banks in the county which offered prizes amounting to $100. Work in poultry was carried on in cooperation with the Co-operative Poultry Association and assistance was given in organizing an economic conference for the benefit of berry growers. The farm advisor of the bank is active in the Agricultural Council of the county composed of farm and other organizations interested in agricultural development, and also in the Farmers' Market. Six hundred farm business analysis blanks were distributed while farm account books and poultry record books were also provided to farmers and have been helpful in starting many farmers in keeping business records.

A CANDLE IN THE WILDERNESS

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

by IRVING BACHELLER

CHAPTER IX

—18—

The Voyage in the Whale's Belly

Amos went out to the fallen tree with his handsaw, and clinging to the upper branches, he began sawing off those below water, flush with the trunk. Soon the under side of the tree was clear of boughs. He labored until the sun had passed the middle of the heavens while Robert on his lofty perch looked out upon the lake and the silent wilderness sloping upward from the shore. He saw no sign of life. When Amos rapped on the side of Robert's tree the young man descended and saw with wonder what the ingenious pioneer had accomplished. About two fathoms from its butt he had sawed, and split out with his hatchet, an opening in the upper shell of the tree large enough for a man to enter. Beneath it he had loosened with a spud the crumbling, rotted heart of the old hemlock and tossed a wain load of its timber dust in the water until he had cleared a space under the shell wider than his shoulders and twice as long as his body. He had carefully preserved the bark-covered arch cut from the rounded side of the bole.

"The big belly of the old tree is our cabin," he said. "It's nigh two fathom long and wide enough for us to stretch out comf'table inside. The stem is a big shell o' good timber. I've made two portholes on each side and rammed a peek hole through the punk for'ard. The wide spread o' boughs above water in the stern will keep her balanced and their weight and mine will lift her bow a little. Do ye notice how I've got 'em tied together? That turns her top into a sail."

Robert said: "But we have no rudder."

Amos bit off a chunk of tobacco and answered:

"We don't need it no more than a toad needs a pocket in his breeches. In wide water with the wind mostly goin' our way we don't have to be nervous about steerage. Daytimes I set straddle back in the riggin' near the stern. With a long stout paddle, I can help her a little to keep her tail behind her. I'll be hid by the green boughs. She'll yaw around some. She's got a right to. It'll make her look nat'ral. But whether she backs up or slips sideways or goes head first she'll be movin' south, and by the guts o' Pharaoh, I think she'll take us to the lake's end."

Amos lifted his right foot and shook it playfully. Robert tells in his diary of the old pioneer's amiable habit of lifting and shakin his right foot when greatly pleased. The man spat and looked very wise and confident as he added: "Don't worry about old Amos. It's bad goin' when he gives up. Le's go below. I'll put on the hatch and show ye how to be captain."

They entered the little cabin. Amos adjusted the bark-covered arch. Coming down through it was a bit of dressed hemlock about the size of a gentleman's cane. Green branches were left on its top above the arch. They resembled a natural outgrowth from the trunk.

Amos proudly set forth the duties of his young friend:

"Ye lie here in the Whale's Belly and keep watch. If the wind blows hard hold on to that stick. If ye see any danger on the right rap once, on the left twice, for'ard three times. Don't make much noise. Just tap gentle on the side, like that. I'll hear it."

After this day they called their ship the Whale's Belly.

They got their packs and wallets aboard. Amos hewed his paddle out of a long strip of dry spruce and smoothed and shaped it with his knife. They carpeted their cabin with a blanket and stored their luggage in each end.

Amos cut fathoms of robin's hedgerow—a luxurious, creeping, clinging vine, with dark green foliage, abundant in the northern forest—and asked Robert to wind it around him. On the string of this vine are tiny prickers so that it is able to cling to its footing as it grows. When Robert was done with the winding his comrade looked like a vine-covered stump.

"Now when I'm back in the boughs I reckon it'll take a sharp eye to see me," said Amos as he boarded his ship, walked astern and sat down in the thick foliage.

His weight lifted the big hollow trunk just free from the sand.

"Now you're well hid," said Robert.

Thus Amos directed the casting off:

"Take that lever and shove her out a little. Then get aboard and we'll pole her into the wind."

Slowly, after much pushing with pole and paddle, the singular craft began her journey.

There was a light breeze from the northwest. At a snail's pace the curious old tree-ship drifted into it. Before it struck her sails Amos had worked her bow toward the south. Soon she was out in broad water with small waves breaking on her side. They cleared an island and she went on as steady as a fifty-ton pinnace. Soon Amos heard three taps. The captain had spied through the forward peephole a fleet of canoes heading toward them in the distance. The breeze freshened. The ship began to swing. Amos sat motionless and let her drift as she would. Ten canoes, filled with painted warriors, passed near them going north. They gave no attention to the floating tree—doubtless a common sight on this lonely water with its shadowed, far-reaching border of towering trees. They seemed to have crowded down to look and to bathe their feet and there to have stood pushing and peering over one another's shoulders, entranced by the scene, for centuries.

The Whale's Belly grounded off a point on a small island many miles nearer their destination. When darkness fell Amos crept forward and lifted the hatch and lowered his feet to the cabin. Sitting down he asked:

"How do ye like the cabin?"

"It's a comfortable place, but I'll be glad to get out and stretch my legs."

"Well, there's nothing on this island. I've listened for an hour. It's well out from the eastern shore. We can slip over the side and take a quiet dip before we go to sleep."

Amos removed his cover of vines, saying that by lying down on the tree trunk in times of danger he thought that he would be well hidden.

They undressed and had a refreshing bath on the sandy beach. The breeze had sunk to almost a zephyr, idling down the vast water plane from the north.

"We'll try to push her out and she'll make a few miles with her own head while we're asleep. Amos is happy."

She was lightly grounded. They worked her free, shoved her into deep water and climbed aboard. They dressed and lay down under their blankets, with the hatch off and roped to a peg in the cabin side. They spoke of the Iroquois warriors whom they had passed.

"A war is on with the Hurons and Algonquins," said Amos. "The Iroquois are out scouring the wilderness like a pack o' wolves before snow flies. There are six nations o' them banded together in their Long House—a chain o' villages on a path under the forest roof from near the North river to a great fresh-water sea in the west. They cultivate their lands. They rule their people smart and with a sense o' justice. But they are fierce and terrible. They have driven the Algonquins and the Hurons from these lands north o' 'em to the great Canadian river. They keep drivin' 'em north'ard. They give 'em no rest on the big split. You may be sure that the Algonquins have moved since we set out. I wouldn't bet a pig whistle that they are on that island."

"The Iroquois are at least semi-civilized," said Robert. "Wouldn't they give us fair treatment?"

Amos answered: "I wouldn't trust 'em. The white man is their p'ison with his meddlin', his God and his thunder-birds that travel with him. He bothers 'em. His death song is like blueberries and honey. We have no friends among the Dutch. The Indians could do as they like with us. We better not take that bull by the horns. I'd rather have hold o' his tail."

The travelers fell asleep and were awakened just before daylight by the chattering of birds above them. Amos arose and looked about. A flock of pigeons flew out of the branches over the stern.

"We're still driftin'," he whispered. "The breeze has freshened a little. I can just make out the treetops on the east shore. Daylight is comin'. My thoughts have been playin' around that handkerchief. Wasn't that like a love-sick gal to hang her handkerchief out over the water? She says to herself if he comes down the lake in a canoe he'll keep close to shore and if it's daylight he'll see that little white flag and grab it. It's like a play o' Will Shakespeare's and me one o' the players. We won't have long to wait for the last act, I reckon."

He began to browse on the dried meat and fish as he stood surveying the scene. He leaned over, scooped up a drink of water in his bark cup and swallowed it. He passed another drink to his friend.

The tinkle of his cup on the lake surface, the whispering of the hemlock boughs and a faint ripple on their ship's side were the only sounds that broke the deep, interminable silence. Soon he was back on his perch in the stern and began slowly working her tail to the wind in a trek toward the middle of the lake. Reaching forward with his paddle between the pressing water and the side of the tree its broad long blade served as a kind of center board.

They drifted on through a day filled with excitement. A bald eagle lighted on a branch of the old hemlock and, presently, discovering Amos, threatened him for a moment with spread wings and open beak—the wild, satanic spirit of the wilderness. He rested a little time and resumed his flight. Toward midday they passed a party of indian women in canoes hauling up fishing lines fastened to wooden buoys. Later a solitary savage crossed their bow, scarcely ten fathoms ahead, in pursuit of a swimming deer. In the dusk of the falling night they grounded on a rock a bow-shot off a point of land. A fire was burning in the edge of the forest behind the point. The timbered slope rang with wild cries.

Those days in the Whale's Belly gave Robert his first chance to try his hand with the delicate mechanism of Peggy's locket. One day it yielded to his patient efforts and Peggy's secret lay before him. It was written on a little square of perfumed paper that bore these words:

"Dare you tell me again?"

Robert needed no interpretation of this message. In a moment he had sounded the depth of its meaning. She had decided that she could not be happy with Rosewell and was planning to break with him.

Doubtless she thought that Robert would soon return to her and beg for help in solving the mystery. Once she knew that he was eager to learn her secret she would have helped him to find it. He thought of that day with her on the forest path. How it glowed in his memory! Soon he exclaimed:

"What a pity! What a pity that my life had to be broken like a tree hit by lightning! It isn't fair."

Yet there was something in this bit of paper that gave him cheer and comfort. He examined the beautiful trinket and wondered what was the meaning of the legend engraved in Greek on its case. The day waned.

With a deep sense of relief he heard Amos crawling toward him in the darkness. Gently his friend lifted the hatch and entered. The cheerful, resourceful Amos was a comfort to the young man. He and his ship were just a part of the wilderness but a kindly part of it. He could make its winds and waters serve him.

"By the liver and lungs o' Pharaoh!" the old pioneer exclaimed in a whisper. "I'm e'en a' most tuckered out and hungry enough to eat a raw muskrat. I ain't dared to move from my perch all day."

He began to strip off the dried meat and devour it. "There goes a twig but I don't mind twigs or moose hair or sand and pebbles," he muttered. "My insides has got kind o' lonesome. They're like a lost man hollerin' for help. Ye can undress and take a quiet dip if ye want to."

Robert stood up with his head through the hatchway and began to undress. The lake was a great inland sea, so big that he was losing heart.

"This is like a sea voyage," he said. "Do you think we'll get through?"

"Well, comrade, I've been in worse fixes and got through. It's an old say ye can tie the hands and feet of an Englishman but unless ye break his head his brain will do as it pleases."

For just a moment the young man opened his heart: "A good Englishman can look death in the face rather calmly. I reckon it's true of a gentleman the world over. I'm not that. I'm losing my manhood. I'm a trembling coward. I get worse every day."

Amos answered "Look here, comrade, don't put no dirty word on Bob Heathers in my presence. Ye don't understand him as I do. By the toenails o' Pharaoh! A man that can suffer what ye have without swearin' or kickin' up a row is as good as any man ought to be in this here world we live in. Ye're half sick—that's what's the matter."

For the first time in many days Robert laughed and with tears of joy in his eyes. Then he told of the medallion and showed the message which had just arrived, as it were. It relieved the young man to hear the encouraging cheerful comments of the old pioneer.

"Come, heart o' gold!" Amos cried out. "Don't live in a coke pit. Hang on to Peggy's skirts and the black thought'll leave ye. Amos is happy."

"But you're not shaking your right foot and so I know it's only verbal happiness," said Robert. "It's a credit to you nevertheless."

Robert took his dip and climbed aboard and dried himself with a piece of linen in his pack.

"It's getting cold," he whispered.

"Yes. The wind has swung into the nor'east. I look for a storm."

Robert lay down and covered himself with his blanket. Amos put on the hatch and looped a cord over the stick which served to hold it down, and made it fast to the cabin side.

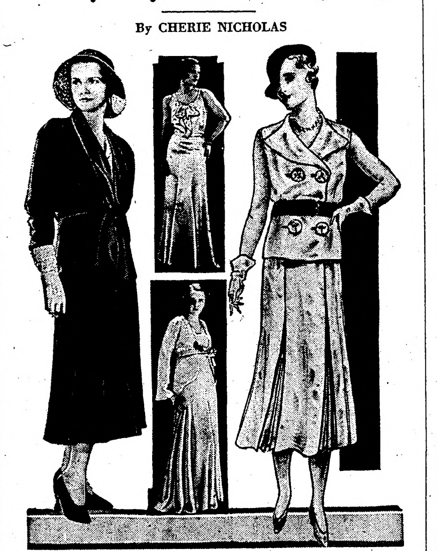
Legends of Empedocles

Empedocles lived in royal style, surrounded by all the pomp and pageantry great wealth could procure. He was exceedingly kind to the poor and gave large sums to succor them. He also provided dowries for scores of poor young virgins to enable them to secure husbands.

Empedocles studied medicine and became a really great physician for the time. He was brought to a woman who had lain for seven days as if dead. "She can, and will, remain in that state, without eating or breathing, for thirty days," declared Empedocles. He was right. She did. At the end of that time he restored her to full life and vigor.—Exchange

Satin by Day and Satin by Night

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



As TO the fabric which is outstanding at the present moment, it is satin by day and satin by night, which reigns supreme in the mode. The style-wise woman who is seeking to replenish her midseason wardrobe or planning her fall costumes will, if she has not already done so, discover that there is simply no getting away from satin either for sports wear or the formal evening gown or for the popular pajama fashions.

Notwithstanding its aspect of luxury, satin, whether it be white or in pastel colors, owing to the fact that it tubs perfectly, has proven conclusively that it is as practical as it is chic for the making of the sports costume. Which accounts for the enthusiasm with which fashion's followers are turning satinward this season.

Just now it is the sleeveless white or pastel satin tailleur which is making definite appeal. The model to the right in the illustration is typical. Details which intrigue in the styling of this attractive sports suit are square revers, big buttons and a belted waistline for the blouse with a generous pleating giving a proper flare to the skirt.

In many instances the mode is varied with a cunning cape arrangement to take the place of sleeves. The very latest satin sports frocks are intricately seamed after the manner which has so successfully entered into the designing of the evening satin frock.

Later on, and now for that matter, the suit or afternoon frock of black satin will become the theme paramount. If not black then brown satin will be first choice, for fashion reports are already placing emphasis on brown for fall. Softly tailored effects distinguish the very smart and very wearable costume pictured to the left. This five o'clock ensemble which is of black crepe satin endorses the jacket-suit styling, with draped collar of self-satin. The blouse is of pale pink triple chiffon.

As to satin for the evening frock word from Paris, as in fact from all style centers, reassures as to a continuance of its triumphs. We are showing in the miniature panel at the top a lovely formal gown made of rose-ivory satin. The neckline of this charming dress subscribes to the vogue which calls for softly tied bows. These bows which are so casually tied are made a feature throughout the styling of satin modes whether they be "sportsy" or ultra formal.

After you have indulged in a satin sports frock, a satin afternoon dress and a satin for formals, you will be liking satin so well by that time the urge for a satin pajama ensemble will likely follow. The vogue of pajamas for formal evening wear is interpreted in alabaster crepe satin as shown in the other tiny panel. Curved seamings suggest an empire silhouette in the bodice. Shaped inserts in the wide trousers contribute a graceful fullness below the molded hipline. The girdle tied about the modish jacket foretells a trend to short-waist empire lines which seem imminent for fall and winter.

SLEEVES ACQUIRE SOME IMPORTANCE

Sleeves are interesting and important enough to write volumes about these days. Every couturier not only has his, or her, own idea about them but the word idea is in the plural where all of them are concerned, says an authority.

They have no one length or type this summer—that is certain. The long and the short of it, according to Patou, goes something like this: Printed silk or crepe from the elbow to the cuffs, fitting the arm rather snugly. The fullness in the tucking is released after an inch and the ruffle falls to midway betwen the elbow and the wrist.

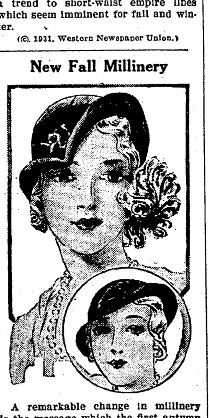
This short sleeve is simplicity itself. It strikes the arm when finished halfway between the shoulder and the elbow and has only a three-inch cuff put on very much like a man's shirt cuff, but instead of cuff links the ends that come together are made into tiny pleats.

Maggy Rouff has made a "dancing" sleeve that is delightful. It has a run of six parallel tucks just above the elbow and from there on the under side it falls in cascades almost to the wrist. At the inside of the elbow it is short and lined with white. The white extends further than the outer layer and when the arms are lifted in dancing the effect is everything to be desired.

Cottons Hold Their Own With Silks and Satins

If you ever had an idea that cotton materials were in any way inferior to silks and satins, you will have to revise your opinion this summer. Sheer fabrics such as organdie, plain or embroidered batiste, and dotted swiss are used not only for informal evening dresses but for those of the more formal sort. June bridesmaids will wear pastel-toned organdie dresses, and brides will wear fine embroidered batiste. Usually these lighter, sheer cotton materials are worn over taffeta or silk crepe slips, taffeta being the smartest choice for evening; but you may prefer a slip or petticoat of tulle or batiste trimmed with lace edging and insertion.

New Fall Millinery



A remarkable change in millinery is the message which the first autumn hats carry. The initial chapter of the story has to do with little felt or velvet shapes which are almost too quaint to seem possible in this age and day. They are worn at a tilt which is tantalizing, over one eye and showing one side of the coiffure. Feathers on them, too, either perky little colorful novelties or sweeping ostrich of the most picturesque sort. Speaking in general it is the hat fashions of the second Empire period which is the inspiration for 1931 millinery. Just at present the theme uppermost in the mind of designers is the Empress Eugenie silhouette. Worn at the recent Paris races were any number of cunning chapeaux of the type as shown in the sketches herewith. The little felt in the circle is one of the smart new derbies.

Red and White and Brown

This is a new alliance of colors which appears again and again in smart costumes. In one instance a frock of brown and white printed silk was accompanied by a red hat and red accessories. In another a brown suit had a red and white scarf and was complemented by a red bag.

On the Funny Side

HOPELESS

While Will Rogers was on his whirl-wind campaign for Red Cross funds, he tackled a rich man in one of the hotels he stopped at, who had the reputation of being a tightwad.

"The whole trouble is," exclaimed Rogers, "that one-half the world doesn't know how the other half lives."

"I don't call that much of an argument," retorted the tightwad, "the other half doesn't know either."

And for once, Will was at a loss what to say.

STAGE COACH TALES

By E. C. TAYLOR

The Vanderbilt of the Stage Era

LUCIUS WITHAM STOCKTON was to the stage coach era of transportation in the United States what Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt was to the railroad era—the outstanding figure, almost the "czar," of his time.

Stockton was born in Flemington, N. J., the son of Lucius Stockton and grandson of Rev. Philip Stockton, famous as the "Revolutionary Preacher," who was a brother of Richard Stockton, signer of the Declaration of Independence.

Little is known of his early life, but it is known that he drove stage coaches for a time, and appeared in Uniontown, Pa., lured westward by the call of the National road, and married Rebecca Moore, daughter of Daniel Moore, an old stage proprietor of Washington, Pa., before he was twenty-four years of age. They had six children. His second wife was his first cousin, Katharine Stockton, and four children were born to them.

Stockton became wealthy operating stage coaches over the famous old National road from the Atlantic seaboard to the Middle West, and was perhaps the most colorful figure of his day.

Early in his career he once raced a horse and buggy against a locomotive between Relay House and Baltimore, Md., and won the race. He drove a favorite gray horse in that contest.

Stockton was a great lover of horses, and developed his own special strains for his stage coach lines. He had a strain called the "Murat" and another called the "Winflower," which many experts declare have never been surpassed for nerve, beauty and speed. This can never be determined, however, as the two strains have died out.

He was a familiar figure along the National road, and became known as the "speed maniac" of his day. He had a span of beautiful Winflower mares, which Hanson Willison, one of his drivers, has recorded were named "Sal" and "Bet." He frequently drove this span from Uniontown to Wheeling, W. Va., between breakfast and tea time, stopping two or three hours at midday in Washington, Pa.

Stockton always had the hostlers add a little whisky to the water given this span to drink, and the spirited, fleet steeds became so accustomed to their "tipple" that they refused to drink unless their water had a little whisky in it.

He also frequently drove from Uniontown to Cumberland, Md., in a day, stopping at the stage coach station along the way to transact business. Also a drive from Cumberland to Hagerstown, Md., a distance of 66 miles, was an ordinary day's drive for him.

He had a private carriage, a long, open vehicle, which he called "The Flying Dutchman," and which was famous among horsemen and sportsmen of the time.

The famous span once ran away with him, when he was driving his wife and sister over the National road. His sister clutched frantically at him, but he didn't pay any attention to her cries, and soon had the spirited team under control.

Stockton had a factory in Uniontown where nearly all of the coaches of the National Road Stage company, which he had organized and which ran nearly all competitors out of business during the heyday of the National road, were built by experts. Maj. William A. Donaldson was one of the foremen at the factory on Morgantown street.

All stage coaches of the National road days were named, mostly for famous personages of the time. Stockton had one named "John Tyler" in honor of the Vice President of the first Harrison administration. When Tyler, on the death of William Henry Harrison, succeeded to the Presidency and vetoed the United States bank bill, Stockton was very much angered. Going into the stage coach yard, soon after the veto was announced, he spied the "John Tyler" and shouted to Donaldson:

"Donaldson, can't you erase that name and substitute another one? I won't have my coaches named for a traitor."

"Certainly I can," Donaldson replied. "What shall the new name be?"

"Call it 'General Harrison.'"

So the change was made. Donaldson was a Democrat, and was much amused by the incident.

Stockton died in Uniontown April 25, 1844, at "Ben Lomond," his elaborate estate. He is buried in the cemetery at Washington, Pa., where rest many other builders of the Allegheny Mountain region.

Spider Builds Diving Bell

A spider that lives under water is an air-breathing insect like the garden variety. It can remain under water for many hours at a time and even builds its nest there and rears its young by means of air which it collects on the surface, and stores in a reservoir made of its silk.

In midwinter, among the pondweeds, it spins a delicate, flat web, an almost invisible sheet. Then it climbs a plant to the surface, to collect air. It may swim awhile on its back to entangle air in its thick hairy coat, and then smartly dive. The effect is, the air goes with it, caught by its hair, and between its eight legs.

ETHIOPIA TO HAVE TASTE OF FREEDOM

Emperor Grants Constitution, but Remains "Head of the State."

Ethiopia, one of the last absolute monarchies in the world, is to have a written constitution. A voluntary decree of Emperor Haile Selassie, ruler of this isolated African mountain kingdom, recently ordered the institution of a two-chamber parliament and a fundamental code of laws.

Emperor Selassie will remain the head of the state, but will govern Ethiopia, better known to us as Abyssinia, in conformity with the constitution.

Constitutions, or guarantees of fundamental law and principles, are nothing new in the light of history, says the National Geographic society. The United States is often regarded as the originator of the device, but the Greeks had a series of city-state constitutions, 158 in number, three centuries before the birth of Christ. Emperor Justinian used the word for the code of Roman laws compiled during his reign.

Today, practically every country in the civilized world has a constitution of some sort, although nine-tenths of them are less than 50 years old. All the important countries of the world except England have written constitutions. In effect, England has a "constitution," because the courts and parliament recognize a general series of fundamental laws, often referred to as "constitutional law," which in effect are similar to the written constitutions of other lands. The colonies and self-governing dominions of the British commonwealth nearly all have written constitutions.

World-wide adoption of written constitutions followed many changes in government after the World war. Soviet Russia adopted a constitution on Marxian principles in 1918, which has been a model for other states of the Soviet union.

Other countries whose people received constitutions, or radical changes in existing constitutions, since the World war, include Afghanistan, Albania, Estonia, China, Finland, Lithuania, Egypt, Latvia, Germany, Irish Free State, Free City of Danzig, Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Iceland, Iraq, Yugoslavia and Spain.

In a few countries national constitutions are underlaid with state or divisional constitutions. The United States, Germany, Brazil, Argentina, Switzerland, Mexico and the Soviet union are the chief "federalistic" republics with two complete constitution structures.

Bolivia once was so divided, but in 1886 the sovereignty of the states was abolished and they became mere departments under the Bolivia constitution.

Most of the constitutions of the western world, and many of the newer ones of Europe, are modeled directly on that of the United States.

Chile is an outstanding exception, in that its constitution calls for a "responsible cabinet" whose members sit in the Chilean congress and must resign when there is a formal vote of lack of confidence.

Few Germans Rank as Middle Class

It is actually true today that the mass of the German people, excepting only a tiny group, belong economically to the proletarian class. The strong middle class of prewar days now differ from the working class only in its traditions, its memories and its point of view—not in income.

The tax records reveal the facts. Income tax begins on all incomes in excess of $300 a year. Among the 32,000,000 persons gainfully employed, about 23,000,000 are liable to income tax on an average income of about $400. The rest, of course, have even less.

If the middle class is reckoned on the broadest possible basis, to include every one with an income of $600 to $9,000 a year, under which is a proletarian standard and over which is riches, it still encompasses only 10 per cent of the population as compared with 25 per cent of this class in England.

But if $4,000 is taken as a minimum comfortable middle class income—and this is reasonable, estimated by the cost of living in Germany—then there are only 77,000 people all told in this class.

Add the 30,000 rich people with incomes of more than $9,000 a year, pyramiding up to the multimillionaires, and you come to the startling conclusion that only some 100,000 people out of Germany's 64,000,000 population are really free from financial cares and enjoy a comfortable bourgeois existence.—Dorothy Thompson in the Saturday Evening Post.

Dog Made Trouble

The subway service of Paris was interrupted for half an hour in order to permit of the rescue of a terrier dog, hidden 15 days in a tunnel near Odeon station. Train drivers reported the dog had been staying about the lines, and they had had to stop several times to avoid killing him. The dog had become so frightened that police and firemen had to lasso it before it could be brought out.

Ten Gauge, Double

"And how was your father-in-law looking last time you saw him?"

"Straight down the barrel!"

Bouncing Back

"Something back?" asked the poet.

"I fear so," said his wife.

"What is it—a poem or a check?"

6 PLIES UNDER THE TREAD
OLDFIELD TYPE

Here Are the Reasons Firestone CAN GIVE YOU EXTRA VALUES

ONLY by comparing manufacturing, construction, and distribution can you determine what is behind the price tag on the tires you are asked to buy. Price alone is never an index to value unless you know the reputation and ability of the manufacturer and what advantages he has in purchasing of raw materials, manufacturing efficiency, and distributing economies. These are the factors that determine tire value.

Read the facts at the right—then go to the Firestone Service Dealer in your community and make your own comparisons with cross sections of Firestone Tires and special brand mail order tires. See the Extra Values you get by equipping your car with Firestone Tires.

Manufacturing Efficiency

Firestone control every step in the manufacture of their products—own their own rubber preparation factory in Singapore—their own cotton fabric mills—and their own huge tire factories—the most efficient in the world. With these great advantages Firestone save millions of dollars annually, which are passed on to car owners in Extra Values.

Mail Order houses have their tires built as a part of a miscellaneous assortment of production by some manufacturer who is unknown to the public. Mail Order houses are dependent upon others for their tires.

Distribution Economy

Firestone have the most efficient and economical distributing system through Service Dealers and Service Stores. Firestone know tires must carry with them the necessary service for the economy, safety, and satisfaction of car owners. Special brand mail order tires are usually made just to sell, with limited or no facilities for servicing the car owner after the sale.

★A "Special Brand" tire is made by a manufacturer for distributors such as mail order houses, oil companies, and others, under a name that does not identify the tire manufacturer to the public, usually because he builds his "best quality" tires under his own name. Firestone puts his name on every tire he makes.

Double Guarantee—Every tire manufactured by Firestone bears the name "FIRESTONE" and carries Firestone's unlimited guarantee and that of our 25,000 Service Dealers and Service Stores. You are doubly protected.

Auto Giro
SEE IT FLY
State Fair

DAILY FLIGHTS by an autogiro—windmill type of airplane—will be featured at the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, Sept. 5 to 12.

The autogiro can "hover" in the air like a big kite. It takes off sharply and descends vertically, more slowly than a parachute jumper.

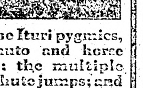
See Cliff Aeros, the "human cannon-ball", shot from the mouth of a giant gun.

See the old-fashioned balloon ascension from directly in front of the grandstand with the professor dangling by his toes from a trapeze attached to the chute.



See the Ituri pygmies, the auto and horse races; the multiple parachute jumps; and the great fireworks show "The World on Parade".

These are the high spots on the program.

NEW EXHIBITS FOR 1931 STATE FAIR

Displays to Depict Progress In Agriculture, Industry and Home-making.

The world moves.

Keeping pace with progress in agricultural methods, in industry and in the improvement of living standards on the farm and in town has been the thought in planning the educational program of the 1931 Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, September 5 to 12, according to D. D. McEachin, President.

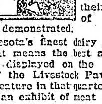
To reward those who have contributed to such progress and to encourage further endeavor, premiums aggregating $123,751 are offered by the State Fair this year.

Recognizing the importance of Boys' and Girls' Club work in building Minnesota's future, premiums totaling $24,596 have been posted in that department. Twelve hundred youthful farmers and home-makers, leaders among more than 45,000 4-H Club members in Minnesota, will compete in junior livestock and home economics contests and demonstrations at the Fair this year.

Cattle, horses, swine, sheep, goats and poultry valued at millions will be exhibited, and premiums in these divisions will amount to almost $55,000. Indications point to a record showing.

The Exhibit of Minnesota's finest grains, grasses and vegetables in the Agricultural Building will demonstrate what progress is being made in the improvement of farm and garden crops in the various counties of the state. More than usual interest will be centered in the Horticultural display, for the season has been especially favorable for the growing of many varieties of fruits and berries, and the perfume of thousands of blossoms of wild and cultured flowers will pervade the building.

What's new in machinery and labor-saving devices? That question will be answered to the hour at the 60-acre "clinic" on Machinery Hill—always an attraction to the State Fair visitor whether he is a skilled mechanic or is just curious to learn how a wheelbarrow operates. In addition to old, established lines of farm, road-building, industrial equipment and labor-saving devices for the home, the newest improvements will be featured, and their methods of operation will be demonstrated.



Minnesota's finest dairy products—and that means the best anywhere—will be displayed on the mezzanine floor of the Livestock Pavilion. An added feature in that quarter this year will be an exhibit of meat cuts—beef, pork and mutton—arranged by the packing industry for the Northwest Livestock Show Committee. There one may learn how to buy and prepare meat most economically. Space will be occupied by a special display by the United States Department of Agriculture.

A visit to the State Exhibits Building on Machinery Hill will be the equivalent to a short course in Minnesota government. Many varieties of game and fish will be shown in the building set aside for that purpose.

Every woman attending the State Fair will find many new objects of interest in the building devoted to Woman's Activities, and an outstanding collection of pictures by Minnesota and foreign artists will be shown in the galleries adjoining.

Manufacturers of automobiles and varied industries will present their newest products at the fair. There will be an Aircraft Show, with prize competition for models displayed, and numerous other educational features.

The admission fee will be 50 cents.

An ad a day keeps he wolf away.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fricker spent the week end visiting with relatives at Black Duck.

Rev. and Mrs. L. M. Redal, Mrs. G. Sanoden, Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and son Milton spent Wednesday over at Grand Forks.

Many people from here took in the dedication of a new church of the Moose River Lutheran Congregation at Gatzke on Sunday. Rev. L. M. Redal took part in the program.

The following visited at the Louis Wegge home on Sunday: Mr. and Mrs. Fred Ohms of Larimore, N. D., Raymond Wegge of MacCanna, N. D., Mr. and Mrs. Gustave Pastnaick of Faynesvile Minn, Irene Wegge of Fargo, N. D., Dennis Wegge of Hillsboro, and Mrs. A. L. Carlson of Crookston.

The Hinckley Fire

September 1st marked the 37th anniversary of the Hinckley fire in Pine county in 1894. It was on September 1st of that year, that the fire which had burned all over the county during the summer, broke into a roaring sea of flames and, in one day destroyed Hinckley, Sandstone and six other prosperous towns causing the death of 418 residents and making 2,000 others homeless.

Famous in the annals of Minnesota for the devestation that it caused is the Hinckley fire, when the residents of the village, penned like rats in a trap, were smothered and burned to death in the worst forest fire in the history of the United States. In 1910 when Chisholm and Baudette, with other Northern Minnesota villages were visited by fires, the minds of Minnesotans traveled back in memory to the day sixteen years before when what had been a happy, prosperous village was transformed into a "veritable hell on earth" in the words of a survivor, so quickly that but few escaped.

Editors Note: I was born aftor the Hinckley fire and cannot say much about that only from history but, we do remember the Baudette fire as we saw plenty smoke and the game that was driven from the timber area by the fire. In the town where I lived at the time of the fire I saw seven Deer walking down main street at 5 o'clock one morning when the smoke was heavy and bears played in the woods back of our house and, also left their tracks in our garden where they had eaten of the few vegetables that we had been able to nurse thru the drought.

Highway Oiling Commences

The State Highway Department pulled in here yesterday with several trucks, graders, tractors and other equipment for oiling the highway from Holt to Greenbush. It looks like we had a big factory going here with all this machinery around and the tar and oil heating plant smoking away. It requires a crew of about 30 men to operate the whole outfit when they are oiling at full speed.

4-H Club News

The Holt 4-H Club will meet at the Sunnyside School on Friday evening, Sept. 11, at 8 o'clock. A program will be presented by the members. The public is cordially invited to attend.

Band Practice

The newly organized band got together Tuesday evening for their first practice and they had a nice time. Mr. Halvorson of the Peppler Piano company at Grand Forks was here with a lot of instruments and, several of the boys who know something about music struck right up and played for the new members.

Several of the boys have this week procured instruments and are practicing how to blow so that they will be able to make a longer practice next time.

The Band will meet again on Tuesday evening, Sept. 8th, and all those who have instruments are urged to be here to get in line and play. Mr. Halvorson will be here and help to get the boys going.

If you are interested in the band, come in Tuesday nite.

K. O. Flakne, distributor for the Northwestern Minerals Products Mfg. Co., unloaded a car load of mineral feed here this week.

Postage Rate 3c to Canada

Commencing Sept. 1st, the postage rate on letters to Canada will be 3c, and on postal cards 2c.

The Holt postoffice will close at 1 o'clock p. m. on Labor Day, Monday Sept. 7th. - Postmaster.

The local school will begin the current school year on Tuesday, September 8th. Pupils are urged to be present on the opening day so that registration may be completed at that time. Prompt enrollment and regular attendance are very important factors in mading a schoel year a successful one for the pupil. Pupils from other districts who are entering High School this fall are requested to bring a record showing that they have satisfactorily completed their eight grade work.

The members of the faculty for the 1931-32 school year are as follows:

E. O. Nybakken, Superintendent
Edith Anderson, Principal
Alfred Sather, Upper grades
Jeanette Lanman, Intermediate grades
Eunice Johnson, Primary grades

Miss Anderson and Miss Lanman were members of the teaching staff last year while Miss Johnson and Mr. Sather are new members. They are both graduates of the Moorhead State Teachers College.

The building is being thoroly cleaned and the neccessary repairs are being made so everything will be in readiness for the opening year. The plan, at present, is to have all the grades located on the upper floor which will facilitate teaching a great deal. The grade room which was previously located downstairs will be used as a High School classroom.

Patrons of the school are invited to visit the local school at any time, and it is hoped that they will do so as often as possible. The school is a community asset and the interest of the people of the community in the school will aid it to grow and develop to best serve the needs of its patrons.

Mrs. H. Peterson and children spent the week end visiting with relatives at Thief River.

Ernest Jefferson arrived here last week from St. Paul for a visit.

Gigantic Structure
Herodotus estimated that 100,000 men were engaged for 20 years in building the Great pyramid.

Ralph Ness and family visited relatives in Greenbush Sunday.

Harvest Festival

The annual Harvest Festival of the Nazareth Lutheran church sponsored by the Ladies Aid and the Luther League for the purpose of raising money for the local church budget, will again be held at the Hjalmer Johnson home a half mile north of Holt on Sunday, September 6th.

The Festival has been held at the Johnson home the past few years and they have a fine grove which makes an ideal place for the celebration.

The Ladies Aid will have charge of all the eats which they also furnish and the Luther League will take care of the Ice Cream and refreshment stand.

This is an annual affair and it is hoped that the people in this community will again turn out and cooperate with those in charge to make this a successful event for the church.

Several hundred people come to this festival each year and all those who attended it last year are invited to come back this year and bring your friends.

The program for the day will commence at 10 o'clock in the morning and will be as follows:

Speech by Rev. Larson, president of the North Star College at Warren.

Songs by the Quartettes from North Star College.

Reading by Miss Eunice Johnson.

New Highway Being Graveled

Lyle Sloan, contractor from Ellendale, Minn., is here this week with a big graveling outfit and is graveling the new highway between Holt and Thief River Falls. He is using about 15 trucks and has already covered 4 miles from Holt south.

They are taking the gravel in a pit on the R. Sagmoen farm about 4 miles southwest of town, but will take only enough there to gravel as far as Steiner. Gravel for the road between Steiner and Thief River Falls will be taken in the C. Engen pit at Rosewood.

Mr. Sloan took the job to gravel the 11.9 miles for $6,779, using 9,520 cubic yards of gravel.

FOR SALE—A 1929 Chevrolet truck. 1½ ton capacity with new grain box and extra low gear. In A-1 shape for $450.00. Will take milch cows as part payment.

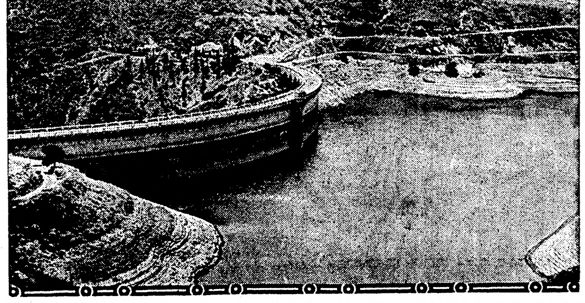
Hollywood Fears, So Great Dam Will Be Junked



Because the people of Hollywood have been under mental pressure and fear that some day they may be washed out, the costly Mulholland dam and the beautiful lake formed by it will be junked. The city engineering advisory board suggested abandonment, not on account of structural weakness, but for psychological reasons, to allay apprehension of the people living below it.

Important Strikes Are Made in Abandoned Mines.

Reno, Nev.—The business depression and the low price of silver have stimulated the gold mining industry in Nevade, with new important discoveries of high grade and shipping ore being made in scattered sections.

Many of the famous old silver camps, such as Virginia City, Tonopah, and Goldfield, have responded to the world-wide cry for gold and mine operators are shipping the yellow metal from camps formerly thought to be only silver producers.

Unemployed persons have taken to the Nevada wastelands, some with a small grubstake and visions of a strike, others merely in the hope of finding steady employment at a daily wage.

$45,000 a Ton.

The latest strike to capture the imagination is located 63 miles from Reno, at Fireball camp in Pershing county, where ore samples assayed 257 ounces of gold and 123 ounces of silver per ton. Conservative engineers who visited the Fireball returned with glowing reports.

The greatest gold excitement of the year took place in February when two old desert men, Charley and Jim Scossa, discovered high grade ore assaying as high as $45,000 a ton, in the old Rabbit Hole district, 50 miles above Lovelock. This discovery caused a real gold rush and the camp now has grown into a permanent town.

Mining men of Tonopah are speaking in whispers of some great gold discovery which has been made in that vicinity.

In Famous Camp.

High grade veins in an old abandoned mine with ore assaying into the thousands have been discovered during the last month in that famous old mining camp, Virginia City, which once poured $70,000,000 of silver into the national treasury when it was needed most by the Union during the Civil war.

Numerous good gold discoveries have been made in Elko and Humboldt counties, which give promise of production for years to come. Southern California capitalists are quietly investing huge sums in developing work there.

Even the old "ghost town" of Gilbert has had a resurrection and a small army of leasers are working there in old mines. Round mountain continues to be the most prosperous camp with 200 men employed at Gold Hill and Sunnyside.

Trio of Indian Tribes End Ancient Feud

Seminola, Okla.—A feud of several centuries' standing between the Seminole and Sac and Fox Indians has ended.

No one knows how far back it extended, but although there have been no violent outcroppings recently, the bitterness was perpetuated by ambushings of one tribe or the other years ago.

During the recent powwow here, when more than 5,000 Indians gathered, Sac and Fox chieftains bid for peace. Chili Fish, Seminole chief, accepted the offer and the two tribes crowded around the barbecue spits and broke the bread of peace.

Odd Affliction Causes Patient to Shrink

Old Soldier Loses Ten Inches in Nine Years.

Sawtelle, Calif.—In nine years Joe Mayott, a patient at the Soldier's home here, has shrunk ten inches. He is sinking into his shoes, and his head is getting larger.

Joe was born in the Catskills, near South Cairo, N. Y., a sturdy youngster in the best of health. When war broke out in the Philippines Joe went over. When he came back he enlisted for work as a heavy-timber carpenter in Panama, where he fought numerous engagements with fever and heat.

When he came out he didn't feel well. He had recurring pains in his back and legs and he found that his hat was getting too small. Now, at fifty-four, possessed of a sense of humor, Joseph has one of the strangest afflictions known to medical science.

Physicians describe, in scientific terms, his trouble as "osteitis deformanus" and more familiarly as "Paget's." Its progress ordinarily is slow and the changes are involved in the bones. The weight-bearing bones are most frequently involved, resulting in a bowing similar to that seen in rickets, and the absorption of cartilages in joints.

In 1922 Joe was 5 feet 7 inches tall. In 1928 he was 5 feet. Now, he measures 4 feet, 9 inches.

"I've got an occupation," he says. "I knit women's scarfs. Imagine that, will you! I built a whole town once in Chili—and now I've got the 'something doformaus'—and they say it's pretty bad!"

Scotchman Lives Up to Nation's Reputation

Glasgow, Scotland.—During these days of fast changing records a municipal election expense record of $2.16 has been established. It is expected to stand as an all-time record.

Inglis Milton, contesting the park ward at the recent municipal ward election, returned his expenses to the town clerk's office. Milton stated that he published no election address and addressed no public meetings.

Neither, so far as he knows, did any of his supporters solicit votes on his behalf.

Incidentally, Milton did not get a seat in the town council. He polled 246 votes, while his opponent, Victor D. Warren, got the seat with a majority of 3,502. Warren's expense account has not been made public so far.

Russian Girls Lack Flag, So No Year-Book

Paris, France.—Plans for a year book for the 1931 graduating class of nurses at the American hospital of Paris went awry because the Russian girls could not decide about the design of the flag whtich was to appear over their names. None of the girls is sympathetic with the soviet regime in Russia, all of them being White Russians. But Russia had so many flags between the time of the czarist regime and the rise to power of Lenin and Trotzky that the Russian nurses didn't know which was proper. Since the Swedish girls, the American girls and the Canadian girls had their flags in the book, it was decided not to print the book unless the Russian girls could have a flag.

Ants Build Home in Telephone Box

San Diego, Calif.—Ants here are fond of using telephones. They don't use them to talk over, but rather to nest in and stop the instrument. Secretary Allan Perry of the city planning commission, irate at not having his phone ring its customary number of times during the day, found ants had built a nest about the bell and the clapper and stopped all ringing.

First Rocket Airdrome Is Opened Near Berlin

Berlin.—The world's first rocket airdrome was recently opened near Berlin. It is on a tract a mile and a half square and is equipped with laboratories and workshops. At present it is being used as an experimental station, and engineers are experimenting with a means of flight which will make possible the shooting of mail to America in six hours.

"It's curious how things come to pass," said Robert. "I met this delightful girl—the kind of girl I could tie to. She was brilliant, amiable and beautiful. I know now that she liked me. I know now that probably she would have married me. Suddenly hell opened in my face."

"Hell is all right in its place," said Amos. "Leave it there. Don't try to tote it around in yer memory. It's all foolation buildin' a fire in yer brain and gettin' burnt by it. Ye must keep hold o' Peggy's hand. That gal and me is doin' our best to lift ye out o' trouble. Don't hang on to it."

While they were asleep the wind rose and a big wave washed them off the rock. They were soon jumping and splashing in a heavy sea and water was coming in at the portholes so that Amos had to plug them on the windward side. For a time Robert did not awake but was restless with troubled dreams.

Amos had grown fond of his young comrade who was what he called "a fair player"—unselfish, brave, taking the hardships and perils without complaint. Long before then the shrewd man had decided that Robert had best keep away from Boston. "It's the road to Egypt but we'll keep a goin'," he said to himself.

Amos was long awake tending ship, stopping leaks and worrying for fear the hatch would go over. He could hear the hiss of snow against the side. By and by the Whale's Belly began to bump bottom. Suddenly a wave drove her bow through the bushes and grounded her securely, to the stern branches, on a sloping shore. Then Amos lay back and slept until daylight. The wind had gone down. Amos took off the hatch and looked about. There was a scatter of snowflakes on the laurel and the small tamaracks among which the ship was hidden. A thick mist covered land and water. He left Robert sleeping and went ashore. At last the ship was grounded hopelessly. A yoke of oxen could not have moved her. She had found her last port. Near them was a burned slope of charred stumps and briars and low bushes. He looked about in the cold misty air to get his bearings. He awoke his young friend.

"We're still on the earth and another day has come," he whispered. "We must leave the ship and take to our nags."

While eating dried meat and some biscuits from Kebec, Amos said: "We're on the west shore, and I reckon it's only a few miles to the end o' the lake. It's a good time to travel. We'll take a last look at the Whale's Belly and be off."

"Do you think the west shore is better than the east?" Robert asked.

"It's a choice between rotten apples," said Amos. "But here we are. We'll have to take to our shanks and try to find that trading post."

They packed their things and set out by the compass, each browsing on a piece of dried meat. There was a wet swamp along the shore southward. They had to seek higher ground to get around it. Only a light flurry of snow had fallen, scarcely enough to penetrate the roof of the forest.

"I don't exac'ly like the looks o' things," the shrewd pioneer whispered. "There's Indians near us."

"How do you know?"

"Moccasin tracks!" Amos answered.

They came to great banks of robin's hedgerow. They stuffed their hats in their packs and each covered the other with vines, head, pack and all. Amos had given his musket to the Algonquin chief, so the problem was not difficult.

Amos whispered: "Now if we hear anyone near us we'll lean ag'in' a tree and go on stump duty. Fog and vines are a help in our business."

Soon they heard a sound and both took a stand among bushes, still as a pair of rocks. The shrewd woodsmen knew that an Iroquois camp was probably within a falcon-shot of them. Within two minutes a warrior passed them so close that the white men held their breaths. When he had gone out of hearing they went on.

"It's an unhealthy sit for us," Amos whispered. "There's always a lot o' wounded beasts around an Indian camp. Their hunters scour the bush to find 'em. We'll stump along—slow and careful."

He drew his compass from beneath his collar and took a look at it.

They resumed their journey and had traveled scarcely a bow-shot when a young brave who had been sitting against a tree scrambled to his feet within an arm's reach of the two and ran as if the devil were at his heels. The sight of moving stumps was more than the superstitious savage could endure. With no loss of time he sought a safer place.

The two men hurried onward in the mist, Amos laughing under his breath. They tramped on with no other alarms for an hour or so, but did not come to the lake. Amos led the way over deep moss into a thicket of young pines. The air was clear.

"We're in hell's dooryard," he whispered. "The air is full o' the stink of brimstun. We're a walkin' on the edge o' the world an' if we ain't carefull we'll fall off. I'll set myself ag'in' a tree outside and look around and listen a while. You stay here."

For a few minutes the vine-covered pioneer stood on a stump searching the burned lands with his keen eye. A deep silence filled the mountain slopes and the only stir he could see was that of bushes shaking in the breeze. He returned to his young friend in the thicket.

"Can't see or hear a sign o' life," he said. "But I don't like the lay o' the land here. It's bad for us. A savage upon the slope above could see us a mile off. We'll stretch out under this cover and sleep a while. At dusk we'll go on till the darkness begins to rub hard."

They tore off their vine cover, now in streaming rags, covered themselves and slept. When the sun was low a cow moose and her calf, going down for water, passed so near that Amos awoke. He arose and peered out at the beasts slowly going down the slope. It was to him an unfailing sign that no Indians were near. He awoke his friend. Again they set out, following the tracks of the animals to a pond where they camped for the night. There the roaring and splashing of moose disturbed their rest.

"It's the rutting time and when they get together at night the bulls raise hell," said Amos.

They were up and off at daybreak with no mist to favor them. After an hour of tramping, Amos stopped.

"My God! We've hit another ketchowl," he whispered. "Have ye got yer acorn?"

"Yes."

"Slip it under yer tongue when ye get a chance—not now."

They stood side by side, motionless. Suddenly the trap sprang upon its victims. Two warriors, until then hidden behind trees, rushed upon them with raised javelins. One of them struck at Robert. He dodged, receiving a slight wound in the thigh.

There was no time for taking thought.

The motions of the two were as swift as those in the closing of a pair of hostile cats. Robert seized the weapon aimed at him. The savage stepped in a hole, lost his footing and fell. The young white man stood over him with stripped sword.

Amos had wisely made the peace sign, throwing down his sword and pistol. He shouted to the young man.

"Don't draw blood, for God's sake!"

Many warriors had come out of hiding. They now sat on their heels, motionless and silent, watching Robert, who immediately threw down his weapons. Again the white men were captured and at the mercy of a band of Iroquois braves going north to join their friends and sweep the country south of the great river clear of their enemies before the winter hunting began.

"I Don't Exac'ly Like the Looks o' Things," the Shrewd Pioneer Whispered.

The party was in command of an old, one-eyed chief with a ragged-moth-eaten pelt screening about half his body, on which were many scars. He was dried up like an old tree, without leaves, and ill-favored. Yet he bore himself like a king, haughty and erect. His stern, wrinkled face was like that of an ancient Roman.

"I am graveled for lack of words," said Amos as he presented to him the otter skins, his hatchet and a handful of shelled corn. By signs he made the chief to understand that he and his friend were going to the Dutch, who would give many skins and hatchets and sacks of corn and much strong water to have them sent to the fort on the big river beyond the eastern gate of the Long House.

The old chief opened his medicine bag and took out of it a bone decorated with feathers. In deep chest-tones and with a look of affection he addressed the bone. He lighted his pipe and blew into the feathers a few whiffs of tobacco smoke. The two white men, knowing that their fate depended on the result of this interview with a bone, sat watching the process.

In a moment the chief returned the sacred treasure to its resting place and solemnly arose. With great dignity he blew the smoke from his mouth. In a current it moved northward. His wrinkled, weathered face did not change. He went to Amos, touched the compass on his breast and pointed in the direction whence the smoke had gone. He made the gesture of drawing the bow. His right hand swept from east to west. He scattered dust on a sheet of birch-bark and with a stick drew a rude map in the dust marking different points. By like signs he made Amos to comprehend his decision and his plans.

The pioneer turned to Robert, saying: "The tide has set ag'in' us. They are going to join other warriors massed near the upper waters o' the Lake o' the Iroquois. They will move westward and sweep their enemies from the country. We are to go with 'em. I am to help 'em with the compass and their guns. They think that the great spirit is in the compass and that a little thunder-bird lives in every gun. There are two guns in the party. I reckon that they got 'em from the Dutch. Don't know much about guns. A little scared o' the thunder-bird. Ye needn't to worry. We're a godsend to this band o' ragamuffins. Keep a smilin' face. They'll take us down to the fort, by and by, and trade us off like a pair o' beaver skins. Amos is happy."

Robert, however, was far from happy. Safety and happiness had been near him and yet utterly beyond his grasp. His was a dejected figure as he yielded to this vile durance.

They headed northward with the fighting red men, of whom there were nearly two score, and came that night to an Indian camp. The haughty wrinkled chief was regarded with awe and veneration by his brothers, and the captives were well treated.

In the camp were fourteen warriors, who sat around a fire drinking bear's fat out of cups of birch-bark held together by thorns. On a fire the flesh of the bear was boiling in a pot. By and by the white men helped themselves at the source of supply, with their hands, and ate heartily if not as greedily as the others. Tepees had been built for the newcomers, who were apparently expected. The captives would have had to step on the bodies of at least half a dozen warriors to escape.

CHAPTER X

They Come to Adventures Sterner Than Any They Have Known

Next day the haughty old chief was unable to control his men. The camp became a scene of the wildest deviltries. Fortunately for Amos and Robert, the old man kept his head. A savage would sit down with a bottle of rum or gin, bite the cover off its top, ram down its cork and drink as if it were water, stopping only when he strangled. Getting his breath he would utter a few hoarse grunts of satisfaction and continue to fill his stomach, going crazy with wild excitement before the bottle was finished.

It was a day in hell for the captives. The campground and the tepee bottoms were soon filthier than a pig-pen. The old chief destroyed many bottles and a barrico, meanwhile shaking his head and muttering. By nightfall a grateful silence had come. The fountains of liquid fire had gone dry.

The braves were lying in a drunken stupor. One was dead from a hatchet blow. He had made no outcry of pain, protest or resentment. He had sat quietly, drenched with blood, until he fell over dead. No one paid the slightest attention to him—save the white men, who saw that he was beyond help. Two or three were groaning with sickness. The old chief and three warriors, who had kept their lips from the kill-devil, sat around Amos and Robert by the dying fire.

"Think what the greed of the white man is doing to these poor children of the wilderness," said Robert. "Here is the great injustice."

"Yes, it will make the savages hate us," Amos answered. "But we mayn't stop it. The country is big and wild. The greedy hell-makers sneak away with boatloads o' this devil water to some God-lonesome place where there's no more law than ye'd find in the heart o' a lynx. A million constables couldn't stop it."

"I like this old chief," said Robert. "There's something great about him. He looks now as if all the sorrows of the world—including my own—were resting on his back. He seems not to hear us."

They had heard his name. It was Tawandoha.

Amos answered: "Oh, he is a wise old man of many wars. I reckon he's been fightin' Algonquins and Hurons since he were a boy. He knows 'em and every path in the north and secret ways o' retreat. The follies o' youth are behind him. His pride is no longer in cover and gewgaws but in his history and the things he knows."

They sat a long time looking at the old chief and his faithful warriors who sat motionless, gazing at the fire. Sleep had silenced the sick men.

There is an entry in Robert's diary for that day, which cannot be omitted. He writes a brief account of the debauch and describes the camp at night, adding: "One satisfaction fills my wretchedness. I am probably as unhappy as my dear friend in Boston if he still lives. I find a degree of comfort in this thought."

Muskrat's Winter Abode

The muskrat's winter hut is a dome of vegetation mixed in with mud walls and frozen stiff, which enables the muskrat to eat the roots in the walls, and to keep comfortably warm from the heat generated by the decaying vegetation.

STAGE COACH TALES

By E. C. TAYLOR

The Idol of Stage Coach Days

REDDING BUNTING, "Red" to everyone, was more widely known and had more friends than any other driver on the old National road. His entire service was the "Old Line," the National Road Stage company that did the largest share of the business along the famous highway of a century ago.

"Red" Bunting was 6 feet 3 inches tall in his stocking feet, and was straight as an arrow. He was of a reddish complexion, his features prominent and striking, his voice deep and sonorous. But he was not loquacious, and had a habit of munching. He was endowed with strong common sense—the term "horse sense" originated among the "Pike boys" of the National road and was applied to him—and he was affable, convivial and companionable.

This idol of boys and men alike along the National road was born in Fayette county, Pa. He was not only a famous driver, but also was a trusted stage agent, stage proprietor and tavern keeper. He once owned the Central hotel in Uniontown, Pa., and probably would have died a rich man had he not been a vicitm of despondency and depression when the railroads supplanted the old east-west highway.

During the Presidency of Martin Van Buren, it was deemed desirable by the administration leaders in Washington that one of the President's messages be spread speedily before the people of the country. Arrangements were made with the Stockton line to carry the message westward, as the Baltimore & Ohio railroad was not then in operation west of Frederick, Md.

Bunting, as agent for the stage coach line, went to Frederick to receive the message and convey it to Wheeling, W. Va. "Red" sat beside the relay of drivers the entire distance, 222 miles, although he did not handle the reins himself. The distance was covered in 23 hours and 30 minutes.

Changes of teams and drivers were made at the usual relay stations. Joseph Woolley drove the coach from Farmington to Uniontown, making sparks fly as the coach speeded down the long western slope of Laurel hill. Homer Westover drove from Uniontown to Brownsville, Pa., a distance of 12 miles, in 44 minutes.

Mail coaches in those days carried only three passengers. There was spirited bidding for the privilege of riding in the coaches directed by Bunting on this record ride. That was before they started. Two of the passengers lasted as far as Uniontown, and the third got out at Brownsville. That speed in a lumbering stage gave them too much of a shaking up. It didn't disturb Bunting at all.

This ride occurred before the telegraph wires extended west of Frederick. The Pittsburgh Gazette had arranged to get an early copy of the President's message, and had agreed to pay Robert L. Barry and Joseph P. McClelland, employees of the National Road Stage company, $50 for speedy delivery of the message at their office in Pittsburgh.

Brownsville was the distributing point for the United States mail at the time, and Barry and McClelland took the mail coach, the "Industry," famous along the route, at Uniontown and rode to Brownsville on it, to obtain the message and convey it to the Pittsburgh Gazette.

When the mail was opened, there was no copy of the message for the Gazette, and Barry and McClelland returned home disappointed, and the Gazette had to wait for the next mail.

In 1846, after the railroad was completed to Cumberland, Md., "Red" Bunting drove the great mail coach from Cumberland to Wheeling that carried the message of President Polk officially proclaiming war with Mexico. He left Cumberland at 2 a. m. and reached Uniontown at 8 a. m. He breakfasted there with the passengers at his own hotel—he owned the National house at the time—and then started off again. He reached Washington, Pa., at 11 a. m., and Wheeling at 2 p. m. He made the 131 miles in 12 hours.

"Red" was a firm friend and staunch admirer of Henry Clay, "father" of the National road, and Clay often stopped for days at "Red's" hotel in Uniontown. Bunting named one of his sons after the great Kentuckian.

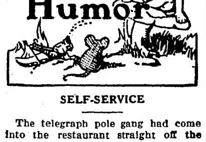
Jewish Surnames

The American Hebrew says that Jewish surnames date only from 1812, when Hardenburg, the Austrian, devised a specious and ingenious form of tyranny by which to afflict the Jews. Since they had never had surnames and had preferred to remain without them in the thousands of years of their existence, Hardenburg saw a new means whereby to inflict discomfort upon the Jews. In this wholesale naming the two most common sources of names were the Bible and the occupation of the person.

Denote Time's Travel

The letter "M" stands for Meridian, the highest point attained by the sun in its daily course; hence, noon, or twelve o'clock daytime. A. M. stands for ante-meridian, or before meridian, which is morning, and P. M. stands for post-meridian—that is, after meridian, or afternoon.



SELF-SERVICE

The telegraph pole gang had come into the restaurant straight off the job, and they were hungry.

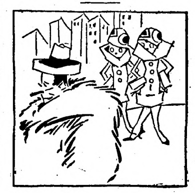
"What'll you have?" asked the lady in waiting to one of the gang's biggest and toughest.

"Beef."

"How do you want it?" she persisted.

Joe waved an enormous and impatient hand. "Oh, drive in the steer and I'll bite off what I want."

NARROW FLAT



Betty—He's very narrow.

Bess—What do you expect of a flat?

Meaning Just What?

She had just accepted him, and they were discussing the "might-have-beens."

"Darling," he inquired, "why didn't you accept that little donkey Smithers?"

"Because," she answered, dreamily, "I loved another."

The Old Sneak

Dorothy, aged five, had her photograph taken recently and when the proof was sent home her mother said she looked too solemn and asked why she didn't smile.

"I did smile, mamma," replied Dorothy, "but the man forgot to put it down."

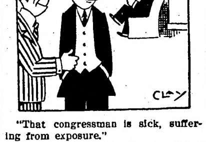
Making Sure

She—Tell me, George, do you love me?

He—Of course I do. Didn't I tell you so five minutes ago?

She—Yes, George, but, then, men are so changeable, you know—Brooklyn Eagle.

THOSE INVESTIGATIONS



"That congressman is sick, suffering from exposure."

"So? Didn't know he'd been investigated."

Meeting the Inevitable

Paul—Give me a kiss or I'll sock you over the head and take one anyway.

Pauline—Oh, I'll not give you a kiss, and don't you dare hit me too hard!

Good for Daddy

"Well, Joan, you have a baby brother!"

"Oh, doctor, I'm so glad! Daddy was getting so girlish with just mother and me about."

Education by Example

"Do you think the modern theater is educational in its influence?"

"It is," replied Mr. Stormington Barnes, "for anybody who happens to be taking dancing lessons."

Fifty-Fifty

"I bet my head that I am right," declared Thomson.

"I bet my pocketbook that I am right," retorted Johnson, just as sure.

"But your pocketbook is empty."

"Yes; equal stakes, old boy."

Obedient

"Sh-sh, dear, you mustn't clap your hands in church, even if you do like the solo."

"All right, mother, I'll just clap my hands under my breath."

How He "Lubs" It

"Right, boys," said Rastus, weakly. "And I's jes' finding out how much I really lubs it."—London Humorist.

Actually the Limit

"Jones' wife thinks the world of her husband."

"Does she?"

"Yes; she even believes the parrot taught him to swear."

TRACING ORIGIN OF FAMILIAR PHRASES

Interesting Compilation by London Journal.

The origin of the following familiar phrases was explained in a recent issue of the London Spectator:

"A Pretty Kettle of Fish."—Descriptive of fish caught by means of a kettle or keddle—i.e., a net fixed with stakes in a stream, and naturally a scene of confusion.

"The Bitter End."—Possibly from the nautical term for the part of a cable wound round the bit, therefore the extreme end.

"On Tenterhooks."—Tenterhooks in the Middle ages were the hooks on which cloth or tapestry was stretched. Tenter was an old word for a frame used to stretch cloth after it was milled.

"To Go to the Wall."—A position in which in Elizabethan times one was least likely to avoid refuse thrown out of the window and therefore the least enviable one.

"To Eat Humble Pie."—A play on "umble pie," a delicacy made out of deer's innards, and much enjoyed by Mr. Pepys.

"As Plain as a Pikestaff."—Originally, "as plain as a packstaff," and referred to the simplicity of that article compared with the numerous adorned staves of official functionaries.

"To Go on a Wild Goose Chase."—An old form of amusement on horseback, consisting of a race between set limits among a certain number of horsemen. The winner then set what course he liked, the rest following behind in a line in the manner of wild geese in flight.

"To Call Over the Coals."—Properly "to haul over the coals," a reference to the old punishment for heretics.

"At Loggerheads."—A loggerhead in the Seventeenth century was the name given to an iron rod with a bulb at one end, used in the navy when heated for liquefying tar. A similar implement was used in inns for heating "flip." From this grew the phrase "to go to loggerheads"—i.e., to settle the question by means of these weapons.

"A Baker's Dozen."—In medieval times bakers allowed retailers an extra loaf on the dozen to repay them for their trouble.

"To Take the Cake."—Although slang, this originated from the ancient Greek custom of awarding a cake of roasted wheat and honey to the soldier who best kept awake during a night watch.

"To Show the White Feather."—A term derived from cock-fighting, in which a white feather in the tail of a bird was considered a sign of degeneracy.

"To Take Down a Peg or Two."—Properly meaning a reduction in the allowance of drink. Old leather drinking vessels had the pints marked on them by means of bone pegs driven through the leather, therefore "to take down a peg or two" meant to curtail the ration.

Rural Hygiene

League of Nations experts have completed a project for recommendation to all nations of a standardized system of rural hygiene. Leaguers are convinced that one element in the present world-wide economic crisis is the necessity of keeping the health and productive capacity of rural workers up to that of their urban brothers. The project provides amongst other things one physician for every 2,000 persons, an auxiliary nursing and technical staff, with facilities in the smallest rural unit to render first aid and carry out prescriptions. The project is to be submitted to an international conference on rural hygiene for final adoption.

Says Animals Will Talk

That animals may learn to talk is the belief of Dr. Bastian Schmid of Germany, who has been studying photographs of the dog's bark and other sounds made by supposedly dumb beasts. He has found evidence that animals have the beginnings of words like those of human language.

Her Fatal Error

Boss—I had to fire the secretary I hired this morning.

Assistant—Didn't she have any experience?

Boss—None at all, I told her to sit down and she looked around for a chair.

Prejudices of our grandfathers are particularly effective in how we observe Sunday.

This Woman Lost 64 Pounds of Fat

Mrs. H. Price of Woodside, L. I., writes: "A year ago I weighed 190 lbs. I started to take Kruschen and now I weigh 126 and never felt better in my life and what's more, I look more like 20 yrs. old than the mother of 2 children, one 19 and the other 18. Every one of my friends say it's marvelous the way I reduced."

To lose fat with speed take a half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—don't miss a morning—an 85 cent bottle lasts 4 weeks—get it at any drug store in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back.

Naturally

Amelia Earhart, the noted aviatrix, is said to be as witty as she is pretty. It was during a Washington dinner given in her honor that a woman said to her:

"Here's another lovely debutante gone and got herself engaged to an old man. Yes, Helen Summers is going to marry old man Calhoun, the banker. What is it that makes these old fellows such winners with the girls?"

"Must be checks appeal," laughed Miss Earhart.

Plenty of Time

"Did Mr. Smith give the bride away?"

"No; he let the bridegroom find out for himself."—Stray Stories.

The Parlor Trick

Mistress—I though you said this room was clean. Do you ever sweep under the carpets?

New Maid—Sure I do, ma'am. Everything.

Soaked

"We got badly soaked."

"Camping, hey?"

"This was at a wayside hotel."

What gives a woman real independence of mind is "money of my own."

Taxpayers are people who scold and do nothing else about it.

Don't expect much of the world, and you will be far less unhappy.

DON'T be Misled Demand the FACTS

KNOW the manufacturer—his reputation and ability. Know if he has the advantages in buying, manufacturing, and distributing necessary to build better tires and sell them at lowest prices. Know if he puts his own name on every tire he makes and stands back of it with his guarantee and responsibility for service. These are important things to look for behind the price tag.

Don't be misled by the claims of mail order houses whose special brand tires are made by some unknown manufacturer as part of a miscellaneous assortment of production and sold to you without the manufacturer's name or guarantee. Buy on facts.

Drive in to the Firestone Service Dealer in your community and see cross-sections cut from Firestone Tires and special brand mail order tires. Make your own comparisons. See for yourself the Extra Values Firestone build into their tires and give you at no extra cost.

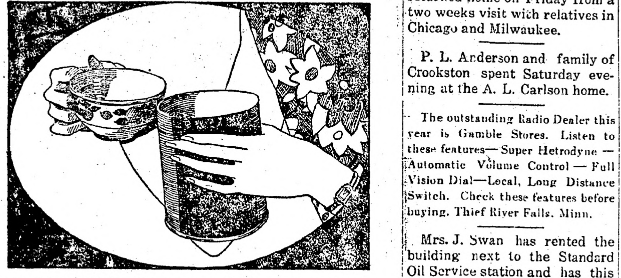
How Many Cups in A Can?



TRANSLATING cans into cupfuls is a thrift measure, and a great convenience, if you dislike to have a little bit of this and a little bit of that left over. For example, if your recipe calls for one and one-third cups of tomatoes, it is thrifty to buy a No. 1 can which contains this exact amount; or if the recipe calls for two and one-third cups of tomatoes you can open a No. 2 can confident that there will not be a spoonful left over.

But since few people can even remember how many gills in a gallon without saying the whole table over from the beginning, it would be useless to try to remember cans and cupfuls. Just post this list in your kitchen, or place it inside the cover of your favorite recipe book for reference.

Cans by Cupfuls

Can Size	Net Weight	Contents in Cups
No. 1	10 oz.	1 1/3
No. 2	1 lb. 3 oz.	2 1/3
No. 2½	1 lb. 12 oz.	3 1/3
No. 3	2 lbs. 1 oz.	4
No. 5	3 lbs. 8 oz.	7
No. 10	6 lbs. 7 oz.	13

It is helpful, also, to know that a No. 2½ can of peaches or pears contains from 12 to 15 halves. Apricots vary widely in the number of halves; a Fancy can may contain 24 small halves; a Standard can usually contains 40 smaller halves.*

Man Breaks Neck in Fall Off Swing

When Sylvester M. Cromer, 26 years old, of St. Paul, fell from a swing here on Friday evening, his neck was broken, and he died more than 17 hours later in a hospital in Thief River Falls, where he was taken. A local operation was performed in the hopes of saving his life. The fall from the swing had paralyzed his whole body at onle.

Cromer was a truck driver for the Anderson Trucking Co. of St. Paul, who were hauling oil on the highway oiling job here. He was sitting in a swing which was not moving, an one of the local playgrounds, near which they were camping. Losing his balance, he fell forward in some unknown way and struck his head on the ground.

His wise, who stayed here with him, accompanied the remains to their home in St. Paul, where funeral services were held this week.

Mr. Cromer was conscious until his last minutes. He told how, as a steel worker, he had often worked many stories above the ground, and had never been injured in a fall, until his little tumble off the swing.

Highway Oiling Progresses

The State Highway Oiling Crew which came here last week to oil the new road from here to Greenbush, has completed a stretch of eight miles between here and Middle River and on Wednesday they moved their oil heating plant and equipment to that village.

Gaus & Culligan, contractors of St. Paul, had the job of heating and spreading the oil. They in turn hired trucks to haul the oil from the tank cars to the big spreader truck, which stayed out on the road all day.

The State Highway Dept. did the mixing of the gravel and oil themselves, using several trucks, tractors and graders in the process of blending the mixture from one side of the road to the other, until it was all soaked black with oil and tar, then smoothening it out finished for traffic. The road north is now just like pavement.

It required ten tank cars of 10,000 gallons each of tar and oil mixed to oil the first eight miles north of town, or 12,500 gallons of this mixture to the mile.

Assessed Valuation Shows a Decrease

Marshall county personal property assessed valuations showed an 11 per cent decrease in 1931 since last year, the new valuation as equalized by the county board being $929,653 whereas in 1930 the assessed value was $1,049,013 according to Levi G. Johnson, county auditor, who recently completed the official abstract of valuations.

Simultaneously with the 11 per cent decrease in personal property valuations, the money and credits valuation for the county showed even a larger percentage of decrease when a cut approximately 15 per cent was noted, said H. M. Hanson, deputy auditor. The money and credits valuation for 1931 totals $689,186 whereas a year ago the valuation was placed at $814,323. There are 511 persons listed as paying a tax on money and credits.

As usual, the townships of the county again have the largest assessed valuation with a total of $559,514 while the villages have an assessed valuation of $370,139. The true value for the townships is $2,178,379 and the villages $1,155,649 or a total true value of $3,334,028. However in the money and credits valuations the villages and the city have the largest assessment with a total of $493,178 while the township valuation is piaced at $196,007.—Warren Sheaf.

Marshall Co. Gets Money

Marshall county has received $166.15 as its part of the total of $225,720.20 in warrants sent out recently by State Auditor Stafford King to 82 of the 87 counties in Minnesota representing 10 per cent of the inheritance taxes for the fiscal state year ending June 30. Each county received 10 per cent on all inheritance taxed paid the state on estates within their borders.

Udstrand-Rux

Miss Violet Rux, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. David Rux of St. Hilaire, and Hilmer Udstrand, son of Mr. and Mrs. Markus Udstrand of Thief River Falls, were married by Rev. Elmer Dahlstrom of California at a three o'clock wedding ceremony Wednesday, September 2, at St. Hilaire. Miss Hazel Rux was bridesmaid, and Emil Rux was groomsman. A wedding supper was served to close friends and relatives following the ceremony. The bride wore egg-shell satin and carried sweet peas and roses. Her bridesmaid wore green crepe and also carried a sweet pea and rose bouquet.

Local School Opens Doors

The local school opened its doors again on Tuesday for the 1931-'2 term of nine months with the following faculty in charge:

E. O. Nybakken, Drayton, N. D., Superintendent

Miss Edith Anderson, St. Peter, Minn., Principal

Alfred N. Sather, Fargo, 6th, 7th and 8th grades, Athletics

Miss Jeanette Lanman, McIntosh, 3d, 4th and 5th grades

Miss Eunice Johnson, Newfolden, 1st and 2d grade.

Misses Anderson and Lanman taught here last year and we welcome them back, and also welcome the new teachers that come here this year.

It puis a lot of life into the small town when school opens and the youngsters start to sprint around, all in a hurry to get back to school to learn something new. It also adds to our pleasures and social gatherings to have the teachers and pupils take part in all the doings during the winter months, a thing they have always done before and which some of them have already demonstrated that they are very capable of doing again this year.

We extend a welcome hand to all the faculty and hope that you will enjoy your work among us here.

Harvest Fest Goes Over Well

The Nazareth Lutheran Church Harvest Festival held at the Hjalmer Johnson home on Sunday was a big success. The big program rendered by local and out of town people was enjoyed very much by the large crowd which attended the annual festival.

Not only local folks come to enjoy the progrm and dinner at these annual festivals but, a lot of people from our neighboring villages and cities come to spend the day here.

In behalf of all those who took an active part in putting on the festival, we wish to thank you all for coming here on Sunday. We also wish to thank the many committees for their work and cooperation and, those who donated hauling and otherwise helped to make the doing a big success.

The net proceeds of the day were $80.00 which was applied on the local church budget for this year for which purpose it was raised.

Band Meet Shows Growing Interest

The members of the local band met on Tuesday evening and had quite a meeting. The boys have already advanced so far that they can run the scale at a fast clip and from now on will set right in and practice. Mr. Halvorson of the Poppler Piano Co., at Grand Forks, who has sold most of the boys here their instruments, will come here each Tuesday evening for some time and assist Rev. Redal, our local diretor, with the first few practices.

Arnold Enger, local temporary section foreman, an old band man says that a band is one of the finest organizations that any small town can have. He has done a lot of work already in helping this band get started and at the last meeting when the buying of a bass horn came up for discussion he throwed in a $5 bill to help pay for a horn.

The board of supervisors of the band did buy a bass horn and, Mr. Shaver who is going to play it also put in $5 to help pay for it. A big horn of this type has to be paid for by the band and, as they have no funds the donations are welcome from all over.

Mr. Wahlin, our genial battermaker also presented the band with a $5 donation.

It is spirit like this that will make the gang feel happy and, we know that with a little cooperation and booting we can have a fine band in a few more weeks. There never was a chance like this before to start playing in a band so, we urge all parents to help their boys and girls get an instrument now.

Come in Tuesday evening and be ready for actual practice.

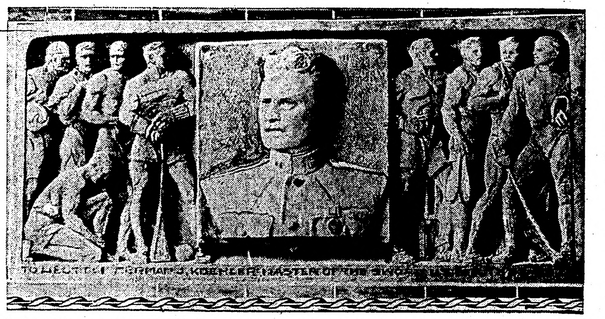
West Point's Memorial to a Master of Swords



A view of the memorial erected to Lieut. Col. Herman J. Koehler, in charge of the physical development of the cadets at the United States Military academy at West Point from 1885 to 1923. Koehler, a "master of swords," was popular with the officers and cadets and their appreciation of his work led the Association of Graduates to erect the memorial in the entrance hall to the gymnasium building.

Tells of Dangers on Volcano Flight

Hop Over Aniakchak "Prelude to Hell," Priest Says.

Santa Clara, Calif.—A graphic description of his recent flight across the volcano Aniakchak is given by Father Bernard J. Hubbard, famed "padre of the snows," in dispatches from Alaska.

Aniakchak is the world's largest active volanco, and was successfully spanned by the Santa Clara university priest in a plane piloted by Harry Blunt. The plane was nearly sucked into the crater.

"It was the most terrible prelude of hell that I ever imagined," Father Hubbard informed friends at Shignik, Alaska, from his base camp at Kujulik bay.

Crater Changed.

"The great moon of the crater was completely changed from its shape last year," he said. "Where we hunted caribou and picked flowers last year is now inside the crater.

"A high fissure many miles long splits the southwestern floor of the crater and the mountain in the center has blown up and is still erupting.

"In the southeastern crater floor there are two new pits which resemble a huge coliseum. They are sending out smoke and cinders continually. The entire crater is black and resembles nothing more than a huge tank containing many cubic miles of sulphur gases.

"Our trip was like a trip to the moon. It seemed as if we were looking into a moon crater.

Feared Being Sucked In.

"The plane rocked and dove. For a time it seemed as if we would be sucked into the huge crater, but I had full confidence in Harry Blunt, my pilot, and in the prayers of the mission native children of Holy Cross, Alaska, who promised to pray to the Queen of Angels each day for our safety and success in our unique venture."

The airplane trip, Father Hubbard declared, was necessary in order to study the activity of the volcano before seasonal changes obliterated many important features.

'Tis an Old Story, But It's Still Good

Columbia, Pa.—Tubs full of rain water were offered as evidence here to substantiate a report that during a recent storm it "rained frogs and tadpoles."

Pools of water accumulating after the shower were "literally alive" with the amphibious creatures, said observers.

Several residents carried cans of rain water containing the frogs and junior frogs to the office of the Columbia News.

Unsinkable Boat Latest French Invention

Latest Craft May Revolutionize Navigation.

Vichy.—Possibilities of the complete revolution of the factor of safety in navigation appeared when experiments on a 25-foot model of an unsinkable boat, held in the River Allier here, were completely successful.

The inventor of the craft, Joseph Chartrain of Clermont-Ferrand, has refused to reveal any details of his method and the high naval officers who witnessed the experiments made no comment except to express their satisfaction.

The little boat, constructed of sheet steel, and weighing 1,320 pounds, was moored in the Allier. The first step was to smash over 50 holes in the hull below the waterline. The boat settled slightly, but preserved entire navigability. The holes, on the basis of scale comparison, are equal to those which would be made by a 24-inch shell. No shells of this size are in use.

The boat was next loaded with 1,760 pounds of lead, well over her own weight, without settling at all. Tilted to an angle of 45 degrees, and, handicapped by the holes and the load, she righted herself immediately.

A police guard was set over the boat immediately after the experiments, pending the decision of the government on whether to buy the discovery and its eventual disposal by the inventor. Among the naval notables present at the experiments were Admiral Fortant, president of the aeronautics commission; Admiral Gros, and Admiral Esteva.

The practicability of the Chartrain discovery is still to be established. It is said that its application to ship involves a 10 per cent increase in weight and a 10 per cent filling of hull space.

This may render it useless for warships, where speed is the prime consideration. On the other hand, merchant ships, seeking safety above all things, are more likely to be interested. Lastly, its use for seaplane pontoons is considered certain to be of great value.

Deafness Blessing for This Man's Neighbor

Seattle, Wash.—Several hours of patient trolling finally repaid Ronald Egerer when he landed a large trout —one of the biggest fish he had ever caught—and he happily contemplated the meal it would make.

He proudly showed it to his wife, who suggested that the neighbors ought to see it before it was cooked.

Egerer put it on a platter and went next door. The neighbor took the platter, examined the fish, then turned to enter the house.

"Thanks, old man," he flung back; "mighty nice of you to give me this fish. It'll make a swell meal for the family."

Egerer's heated comments a few minutes later were halted by his wife.

"He's hard of hearing and thought you were giving it to him," she remarked.

Small Beetle Aiding in Fight on Forest Worms

Newberry, Mich.—A small beetle has come to the rescue of forests in the upper peninsula infested with a small worm which has stripped trees of leaves, according to reports.

Aid has been sought from the entomology department at Michigan State college and the response was that the worm could be killed only by airplane dusting. When a trip was made through the forests recently, however, it was reported that the worms were diminishing in numbers and that they were seen to have been eaten by the beetles.

Ancient Buggy Causes Horse to Run Away

The Dalles, Ore.—A runaway—of all things—startled The Dalles the other day.

It all happened when Nat Garman's kids hitched a horse to an ancient buggy. The horse bolted down the street while numerous young Garmans tumbled out of the buggy. The horse did not stop until the buggy was overturned.

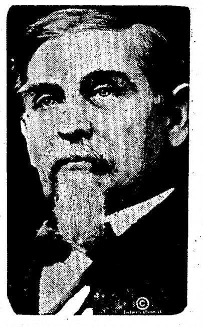
MAYOR FORTY YEARS



Capt. Harry Wooding, a veteran of the Civil war, who served with the Confederate cavalry forces, is serving his fortieth year as mayor of Danville, Va. Captain Wooding was first elected mayor in 1892, during the Cleveland administration, and has served without a break since that time. He is eighty-seven years old and in splendid health, being proud of the fact that he hasn't spent $10 in doctor's bills in the last forty years.

Blow Revives Terrier Instead of Killing It

St. Louis, Mo.—Babe, a two-year-old fox terrier, became so ill in a recent heat wave here that Mr. and Mrs. Otto Walkenhorst decided death would be merciful. So they called the police.

"The officers said Babe could live only a few hours, anyway, and it would be better to kill her,"

The patrolman took Babe outside. One policeman hit her a tremendous blow on the head. The body was covered with a carpet, but the children wanted one last look at the pup.

Babe opened her eyes, and Mrs. Walkenhorst screamed.

"She looked up so pitifully that we brought her inside and massaged her. In the morning she was up to meet the milkman as usual. We believed the blow on the head, instead of killing Babe, really made her well again, because she romps about now as she never did before," Walkenhorst said.

The party broke camp next day, leaving two dead and one who was so ill that he could not travel. They went northward in a path between nicked trees, the younger men under packs, camping at nightfall.

Deep snows and bitter winds fell upon them in the high country and halted the caravan. The Indians put on their moccasins and buckskins. Soon the white men were sorely put to it to keep from freezing. In a mountain valley the warriors wallowed a moose in deep snow and slew him with their javelins. They ate all this great creature, as big as an ox, in one feast. Escape being impossible, the white men were left unguarded. They had dug a deep pit in the snow until they uncovered a flat rock. On this Amos built a fire. When the rock was well heated he put out the fire. The metal having cooled till he could put his hand upon it with no discomfort he covered its surface with balsam boughs. On these they lay down for the night after the feast and with a sense of comfort.

Old Tawandoha had been worried by the early coming of deep snow. He immediately put his braves to the task of making racquets to sustain them in travel, for which he had the needed tools and fiber. They were ready to go forward next day. The main force of the Iroquois were still two marches below in the northeast. Tawandoha had sent out his scouts, two of whom had been slain by a big force of Algonquins coming from the west. Guided by the tracks of one of the scouts in the moonlight this force of one hundred and two Algonquin warriors, equipped with racquets for their feet, descended on the sleeping camp at midnight. A revolting massacre followed. Many of the glutted Iroquois, stupid with meat, were slain on their backs. A few that did not perish broke through the cordon and got away in the black thickets. When the white men in their pit about ten fathoms aside heard the uproar and tumult of this deviltry Amos knew its meaning.

"There's no use in runnin'," he said. "The camp is surrounded. If we got away we'd freeze to death. We'll have to shift kings and take a chance."

They came out and surrendered. The Algonquins had taken possession of the camp, around which the snow was streaked with red. There were the grim realities of Indian warfare. Yet it was not unlike scenes which the eyes of Amos Todkill had beheld in the battles of white men. "In war," he was wont to say, "all men are savages." But a time had come when he was to know the difference between fixed savagery and that born in the raging passions of an hour.

The old wrinkled chief, still proud and haughty, was tied to a tree with one of his braves. The invading warriors were like wolves who have tasted blood. The white men were seized and roughly handled. In a moment they were stripped and tied to trees near the unfortunate Tawandoha and his brave. The fire was kindled. The warriors who bound them stepped aside and indulged in devilish laughter as they whetted their knives.

"I reckon they'll torture us," said Amos. "But don't crack yer nut till they begin. They may wait to get meat for a feast. If you have any influence with God, now is the time to use it."

Often the hand of the historian falters in the task of describing the primitive savage. The unrestrained lewdness of the young, brutal details in the torture of captives may well be hid in the dusty darkness of old records, made by many witnesses and known only to those who love the truth. The cruelties of that night shall not be here described. It is enough to record the central fact that the wise old chief and his brave were singing their death songs until their voices failed in the morning light.

Before the tortures began Robert recognized the Algonquin chief. He called out to Amos: "This chief is our friend. We met him in Father Cauvet's tent on the island."

"So we did, and God be praised for it!" Amos answered. Knowing a number of words in the Algonquin and Huron tongues, he cried out: "Niecanis Doistan Cauvet iatican Achawat iatican."

The chief understood and came to Amos and touched his chin and shoulders. He turned and spoke to his warriors, one of whom hurriedly went away. It was evident that he remembered the beard and broad shoulders of Amos.

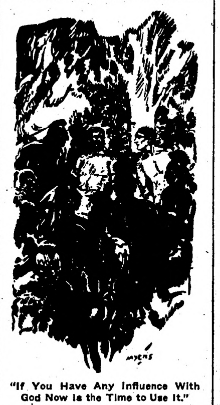
It happened that old Achawat was with this war party, although on account of his age he had had no part in the raid. He knew those of the pale face and when they were in question he was the wise counselor of the tribe. The Algonquin chief had sent a brave for Achawat, the interpreter, and asked that the white men be spared till the "Friend of God" could open their minds and give his counsel. He who had gone down to the island with Amos and Robert, having finished his work on the farm of Madame Hebert, came and greeted them. Robert spoke with him in French.

The old warrior made a speech in their behalf. He told of their coming to Kebec; that they were friends of the good men who talked with God and friends of the children of the North Wind. The palefaces were going down to their brothers in the south. He told how they had been left in a sudden attack on the spitting water and been captured by Iroquois. His words, his gestures, his tones, rising and falling, like gusts of wind in the tree tops, impressed the listeners.

The white captives were released. The Algonquin party, learning of the great force of their enemies in the east, turned westward. Amos and Robert traveled with them.

There were women and children in the camp. The women hauled the loaded sleds as they went on and put up the tepees at night. The weather grew colder, the snow deeper. Every morning hunters went out to get food. For days they would have nothing to eat. Then the hunters would come in with the meat of wallowed deer or a mouse. The carcasses would be consumed in hours of gluttonous feeding, with no thought of the future.

The sick, when the sorcerer advised that they would die, were given no food. Cold water was poured upon their breasts to hasten what their friends regarded as the inevitable end.



"If You Have Any Influence With God Now Is the Time to Use It."

One savage who had been hauling his aged and infirm mother on a sled sent her sliding at breakneck speed down a steep hill. She was hurled over a drop near the bottom and was stone dead when he found her. These details of that journey and many that are more revolting are in the diaries of the two men.

"God's body!" Amos exclaimed one day. "I feel like a horse with the bots. We've got to do something desperate or we'll die o' the scurvy. Any night a band o' Iroquois may come down on us, and we know it's unsafe to be caught in bad company. I've got some meat saved up and hid in a snow bank and I've contrived some runners for our feet. When we get a chance we'll slip away."

For days Amos had been whittling on long strips of dry spruce.

"Blime by I'll show ye what I'm a doin' of," he said to Robert.

At nightfall the camp was in a panic. Achawat came to the white men with news. Scouts had come in and reported a great force of Iroquois coming, only one march in the east. The camp would move that night.

"Better you go," he said, pointing to the south. The sorcerer had had bad dreams.

Amos nodded. He knew that the dream was to red men a revelation. The sorcerer had only to dream that the great spirit was offended by the presence of the white men and that he had clogged their paths with snow as a warning that other troubles would follow if these unwelcome guests were not put away. It is likely that they would not have seen the light of another day save for the kindness of old Achawat. Their packs and blankets were always with them or they would have been quickly appropriated. Without exciting suspicion in the hurry-scurry of the camp they put on their racquets and prepared to move. Amos tied his strips of spruce together and carried them under his arm as they slipped away in the darkness. He stopped a moment at his snow-bank and shoved the frozen meat into his pack.

The camp was a little west of a hill, bared by fire, the top of which, commanding a long slope to the east, and north, was a favorable point for observation, watchmen being stationed there at all hours. It is likely that the chief and his counselors were glad to be relieved of their guests. However that may be, the fugitives got to the edge of the timber apparently unobserved. Their weapons, their hatchet and their pack-saw had been given away. They had only two pocket knives and a diminutive pocket saw.

The snow-shoe moon was up and in a slash Amos was able to read the compass. By a big boulder in the thick wood beyond, they took off their racquets and with them dug a deep hole in the snow. The able pioneer had a store of tinder and kindlings in his pack for a fire which was soon crackling against the side of the rock. They covered their pit bottom with hemlock boughs, wrapped themselves in their blankets and lay down to rest. The heat from the rock and the pure air gave them a welcome sense of comfort.

In the morning Amos made a kettle out of a big roll of white-birch bark and thorns and filled it with wet snow and put it on the hot coals. Soon he had it nearly full of boiling water. In this he submerged the ends of the four pieces of spruce timber. When the ends were penetrated by the heat and moisture he bent them in a rock crevice and stayed them there until the bends were stiff with frost.

Amos began his cheerful talk. "We're too late to ketch Peggy, but that'll give ye a chance to use yer religion, as the flea said when he bit the minister. I'll ship ye off to Holland where ye can wait for her safe and out o' danger. She won't let no grass grow under her feet."

Robert smiled, but made no answer.

They broiled some meat and broke their fast. Before setting out, standing before the fire, they had a refreshing bath in warm water. Amos cut creases in the bottom of each runner to accommodate the leashes of moosehide with which it was to be fastened to the foot. With rising ground ahead they put on their racquets. They acquired great skill in the use of the runners. Their course had been mostly eastward after the first day's travel as Amos thought it best to get across to the Lake of the Iroquois and go south on the ice level with nothing in their way.

In a desperate mood since leaving the frightened Algonquins they traveled recklessly and with little thought of their peril. Amos said that the Iroquois warriors would be detained a while in the north by the war and that until they began to come south there would be few Indians in the lower country save in and near the Long House. He reckoned that those at home were not apt to travel much in bad weather.

They camped that night on the shore of the Lake of the Iroquois. In the morning Amos made a sail of thick boughs of hemlock by tying the branches into a broad mass. The pioneer set forth his plan:

"This lake is a kind of a blow hole in the bush. The North Wind has his mouth to the hole in cold weather. We go out on the lake and stand side by side with the sail on our backs. Each of us will have a tree stem in one hand to stay it. All we have to do is to face south and ride on the runners. I reckon we'll go somewhere and nigh as fast as the wind goes. Don't worry about old Amos. He keeps a thinkin'."

They slipped out into the wind and began their ride over the smooth, crusted snow. For long stretches the strong winds had swept the ice clear. With little effort they kept the pace of horse travel. It was the most agreeable adventure of these weary men. Near nightfall they saw smoke on the western shore not more than two bow-shots away. They lowered their sail and stopped. Amos took a look at the smoke.

"I swear by the mercy o' God!" he exclaimed. "It's a smokin' chimney. White men! Oh, comrade! I love it as the bird loves the green tree."

Augsburg and Fugger Family

A visit to Augsburg in Germany is not complete without making some acquaintance with the Fuggers. This was a Swabian family of ennobled merchants, famous in the Sixteenth century. It traced its descent to John Fugger, a weaver, who lived at Graben, near Augsburg, early in the Fourteenth century. The tourist today will stand in admiration before the old home of these merchant princes. The town house is adorned with frescoes by F. Wagner, while the hotel, near by, known as Die Drei Mohren, was another Fugger town house. The Fugger museum is installed in the so-called Fugger bath rooms, which are decorated in the style of the Italian Renaissance. It contains the art treasures of the family, weapons, coins, medals and golden vessels. The splendid Fugger chapel can be seen in the Catholic church of St. Ulrich.

Thoughtful

It was a very long play, and nearly midnight when the curtain was rung up on the fourth act, disclosing an actor sitting at a table. Somehow his appearance, instead of occasioning applause, created an undercurrent of sympathy. One of the members of the audience ventured to express the sentiments of the house. "I hope we're not keeping you up, sir," he suggested, kindly.—Tit-Bits.

Give—and Take

The best way to enjoy life to the full is to remember that it is a measure to be filled and not a cup to be drained.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Motor Busses Supplant Ancient Railroad Line

Motor busses have supplanted the service provided by the first steam railroad line operated in the United States and its abandonment has been recommended to the interstate commerce commission. The line, 23 miles long, was constructed by the Delaware & Hudson railroad in 1828 between Carbondale and Honesdale, Pa., to transport "stone coal," as anthracite was then known. The Stourbridge Lion, first steam locomotive operated in the United States, was taken for a trial run on the line in August, 1829. The test run showed that the rails, wooden stringers capped with rolled iron strips, were not strong enough to sustain the locomotive and the steam engines were abandoned until the roadbed was strengthened several years later.

STAGE COACH TALES

By E. C. TAYLOR

From Stage Driver to Railroad President

The Hon. Ginery Twitchell rose from obscurity to become one of the leading figures of the era of stage coach transportation, then president of the railroad that put his stage lines out of business, and then a member of congress.

Many a New England child, hearing the cry of "Ginery's coming! Ginery's coming!" and probably wondering what a "ginery" was, watched with delight as a great stage coach with six prancing, reeking, foaming horses came to a stop in front of the Baystate house, in Boston, or the taverns of Worcester, Mass., or Brattleboro, Vt.

Seated atop the magnificent vehicle was a dignified, selfcontained man, ruddy of face, his stout body swathed in a heavy greatcoat and on his head a tall silk hat. Ginery Twitchell would sit erect on the coachman's seat, gather the reins well in hand and suddenly be off with a great rattle of wheels and blowing of horns.

Ginery Twitchell was called "Honorable" even then. Probably it was because of his vast reputation for integrity, and probably also because he was an inveterate politician, and always had a finger in the political maneuverings and plottings of his part of New England.

His stage coach was one of the most famous that ever rolled over the rough roads of the early days of the United States. It was built in 1837 by Henry T. Breck of Worcester, and never was repaired beyond occasionally getting a new coat of varnish. In 1840, at the request of the citizens of Barre, Vt., seats were added to the top, so that the great coach carried 32 persons, 12 inside and 20 outside.

It once carried 62 young women from Worcester on a blackberry excursion, with eight horses drawing this record load. During the presidential campaign of 1840, it carried the political leaders to and from meetings around Quinsigamond.

His last driver, Henry S. Miner, narrates that Twitchell before the days of the railroad collected election votes on horseback, and once rode from Greenfield, Mass., to Worcester, a distance of 54 miles, in four and a half hours. He had relays of fresh horses every six or ten miles, and made the ride at night.

In the days when he was a post rider, before he had accumulated sufficient funds to buy an interest in a stage coach line, he once slept in his clothes, including buckskin underwear, in the American House in Worcester for a week, waiting for despatches from British steamers. He also had men and fresh horses waiting the entire week along the road to Norwich, Conn.

When the boats arrived, Twitchell mounted his horse and started for Norwich. He met the boat, and delivered the despatches in New York hours ahead of any other post line.

Ginery Twitchell was a great favorite with those who rode with him, and the seat beside the driver was eagerly vied for, even in bad weather. He had an inexhaustible fund of racy anecdotes with which he regaled his acquaintances. The people along his post and stage routes trusted him with their business commissions, and he performed a service similar to that of the express companies of today.

After a long period of self-denial in his early days, he bought a stage coach and two horses from a Mr. Stockwell, and established a stage line between Brattleboro and Worcester. In 1843 he owned and operated a line between Barre and Worcester, and later established a stage line from Greenfield to Brattleboro.

In that year the postmaster general at Washington advertised for contracts to carry the mail and Twitchell, instead of bidding for one route, went to Washington and obtained several. Within a short time he was the largest stage operator in New England, owning a large number of fine stage lines and coaches.

One of his feats was driving a coach from Worcester, Mass., to Hartford, Conn., a distance of 60 miles, in 3 hours and 20 minutes, through deep snow. That was on January 23, 1846.

When the railroads came, Twitchell turned to the new mode of transportation, and became first president of the Boston & Western railroad.

NATURAL URGE TO PICK UP BARGAIN

Something for Nothing Is Always Tempting.

"An attempt to get something for nothing is pretty generally condemned," said Mr. Cato Ninetails. "It is not only bad morals, but it is even worse; it is likely to get the attempter into trouble; in fact it often does; and yet I am afraid that there are very few of us who have not, at some time in our lives, tried something of the kind. In such a case, as in many others, nothing succeeds like success; and in most instances—which were minor, with most of us—success justified the means.

"Entering into transactions of this nature is the question of what is something and what is nothing. The something always, in the mind of the attempter, has a value or an apparent value, so the incentive is clear enough. The nothing is not so easily understood. Seldom is it effortless; often it means a great deal of mental, and sometimes even physical, exertion; it may mean patience, finesse and even that self-assault on self-respect that is the effect of an untruth. Nevertheless, the pursuit is fascinating; more fascinating for some people than others, but having more or less attraction for all of us, whether the something be of great or little intrinsic value, or, indeed, sometimes of no value at all except as a sop to vanity or conceit.

"The morals of the situation are rather complicated. There are few, if any, of us without an inherent desire for possession, and the strength of this desire is pretty generally in proportion to what is thought to be the worth of the object. Like the papers in many a lost pocketbook, it may be of no value to anyone other than the owner; and he may find when he gets it that it is not all that he expected; but before acquiring such knowledge, he is pretty often willing to take chances. Now, the whole nub of the situation, it seems to me, lies in the result of such chance taking.

"As several of the classical writers have agreed, and as is generally well known, he who fights and runs away, may live to fight another day; but so may he who fights win the fight. Even without going so far as to say that might makes right, it will have to be admitted that triumph excuses many things, and I should say that it was quite equal to charity in covering a multitude of sins; so the world attitude toward attempts to get something for nothing must be a good deal tempered by results. If the attempt is discovered, or even if discovery is made after attainment, the attempter is likely to find that he is pretty vigorously condemned, and may even feel the effects of the occasionally aroused law; but if he gets something for nothing without anybody finding it out, or can so manage his activities as to leave nothing for a grand jury to work on, he is pretty sure to acquire the reputation of an able, enterprising and resourceful citizen who is a credit to his calling and his neighborhood."—Indianapolis News.

Investigation Seems to Put Razorback in Bad

Spending a day with a razorback hog may not be an attractive enterprise, but such a procedure recently yielded some valuable information to the state forest commission of Mississippi. Believing that the razorback was a serious destroyer of longleaf pines, and wanting to get irrefutable evidence on the subject, P. N. Howell, one of the commissioners, followed a hog for eight and one-fourth hours, from eight o'clock in the morning to four that afternoon. In that time Mr. Howell counted 400 trees which the hog rooted out. At that same rate, the commissioner calculated, in 100 days the razorback would destroy trees valued at $200, based on the cost of their growng and planting—a sum more than forty times the value of the hog itself.

On the Firing Line

Stepping from a taxi in front of the Lambs, a hurrying author presented the driver with a $20 bill to pay a meter charge of $1.10. The driver snorted, and remarked that it was the first twenty he had seen since shortly before the war, and to expect him to change it amounted to mockery. The passenger turned to an actor shading himself on the Lambs stoop, and asked for a dollar and a quarter.

"If I had a dollar and a quarter," returned the actor, "do you think I'd imperil it hanging around here?"—New York Morning Telegraph.

Acres of Diamonds

There is a wonderful story, and a true one, that is called "Acres of Diamonds." It tells how a farm boy in South Africa became tired of the old home and, thinking there was no future there, left the home farm and wandered all over the world looking for a career and a sucessful life.

After having tried his hand at everything and wandering all over the world, he returned to the home farm near the old home town with very little of this world's goods and having achieved very little of the success for which he had sought in vain.

Lo and behold, when he returned to the home farm, he found large buildings covering the broad acres and was surprised to literally find acres of diamonds.

It seems that shortly after he had sold the farm diamonds had been found and untold riches had been literally picked up where he had spent his youth, blind to the wonderful opportunities around him.

Young men of high school age often turn their eyes longingly toward the distant city as a mecca of employment and opportunity. They often fail to appreciate the wonderful opportunities at their front door right in the old home town.

You can do more to help yourself in these times by staying on the farm near the old home town than you can by disposing of what you have at a low price and strike for the big city.

The small town and farm are the best places to live at any time, regardless of what the times are and, you will always raise something to eat.

THERE IS BUT ONE REASON

WHY we ask you to come here for your printing. We believe that we are equipped to give your work the proper attention and that we are able to turn out a satisfactory piece of work.

NOW SHE CAN KNOW!

THANKS to the McNary-Mapes amendment to the Federal Food and Drugs Act, fostered and brought about by the commercial canned foods industry itself, the housewife will be in a position from now on to know that a steadily increasing number of the canned foods she buys are above or below certain standards.

Up to this year the buying of canned foods has been somewhat of a blind business. The fact that such gigantic quantities of them have been manufactured and sold is because the vast majority of them are so uniformly good. But up to the time when the first standards under this new amendment were promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture, the housewife had only her own personal experience and her knowledge of the best brands to guide her choice.

Six Standards Set

Now she has new knowledge put into her hands by the manufacturers of canned foods themselves. This amendment, which was signed by President Hoover on July 8 of last year, authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to establish definite standards for all canned foods products—except meat and meat foods which are subject to the meat inspection act, and canned milk—and to promulgate a form of label designation for foods which fall below the standards which he set.

Standards for six canned foods products have already been set by the Secretary of Agriculture. These standards are for peaches, pears, peas, tomatoes, cherries and apricots.

All canned foods which the Government allows to be sold must conform to the requirements of the Federal Food and Drugs Act. The purpose of the new standards is simply to enable the housewife to differentiate at a glance between the best grades and those which are not so good, but are wholesome and legal.

Substandard Grades Labeled

All canned foods which fall below these new standards will be required to be designated on their labels as "Below U. S. Standard —Low Quality But Not Illegal." This statement will be displayed prominently on the container in immediate conjunction with the name of the product, and will be of immeasurable help to the housewife by informing her that the canned food, while substandard, is nevertheless wholesome and edible.

Full Cans Also Assured

Thus the housewife can not only discriminate as to the palatability and attractiveness of the canned foods she buys, but the new rules promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture also provide for proper filling of all cans. These requirements for fill of container state that "canned foods shall be considered as of standard fill if the entire contents occupy 90 per cent or more of the volume of the closed container. Canned foods which fall below the foregoing standard of fill of container shall bear the name of the article immediately preceded, wherever such name appears, by the words 'slack filled' in letters of at least equal size and prominence."

In this way the housewife is assured that she will not only know that the canned foods she buys are above or below certain definite standards, but that she will get all of the food she pays for in every can.

A New Departure

Such action as this is without precedent in any other industry. Other industries have formed nation-wide associations and set up "Czars" to regulate the conduct of their members, but it has remained for the National Canners Association to go to the Government and say to it in effect:

"We want a law which will not only regulate the conduct of all the members of our association but of every other manufacturer of canned foods, and which will make them state plainly on the labels of these foods whether they are above or below certain fixed standards. And we want you, not ourselves, to set the standards upon which this explicit labeling is to be based."

A Wise Move

This action on the part of the National Canners Association is not based on altruistic or uneconomic principles, but it was taken because the industry was forward looking enough to realize that its continued success depends not only on the quality of its product but on accurate knowledge of that quality by the public.

Under these new standards which take active effect ninety days after they are promulgated, and the first three of which went into effect on May 18, the housewife will be more fully protected than ever before by specific knowledge of just exactly what kind of product she is buying.*

Many Students Attend N. S. A.

Students from 17 Northwestern Minnesota counties, eastern North Dakota, and Canada have reserved rooms in the school dormitories and will be in attendance at the opening of the fall term of the Northwest School of Agriculture, according to a report just issued by J. W. Mlinar, Registrar. With additional reservations coming in daily, it is expected that all dormitories will be filled to capacity.

Each year a number of students are assigned work to assist in paying their school expenses, while others are assisted through special student loan funds. More requests than usual have been received this year due to prevailing low prices for farm products.

Superintendent A. A. Dowell states that the school year will open September 28 and close March 25, thus making in possible for many young men and women to continue their education while helping with work on the farm and in the home during the six summer months.

The regular course, which is open to boys and girls who have completed the eight grade or who are sixteen years of age or over, covers a period of three years of six months each. Students who return for a fourth or preparatory year are eligible to enter any of the Colleges or Universities in the state.

Expenses for the full six months, including board, room, flat laundry, fees, books and entertainment average $145 per student.

Over one thousand students have graduated since the Northwest School was established in 1906, while four thousand other students have been in attendance one or more years.

Eneas Erickson made a business trip to Warren on Monday.

Road Building Supplies Jobs

Road building has been tested during the past year as a means of relieving unemployment and hat been found most satisfactory according to W. R. Smith, president of the American Road Builders' Association. More than a million men are new employed on roads and streets. Two other men are busy furnishing each road worker with supplies, he estimated.

"Money spent on public roads is spread over a wide area in both country and city. The dollar spent in road and street construction has double value; it pays the bills of the worker and thereby aids in creating a stronger market for commodities, and it has a permanent value in decreasing the cost of highway travel that effects everyone," continued Mr. Smith.

"A man out of a job needs it where he lives and road and street work bring the job to him. Highway work readily absorbs men from all clases of industry temporarily inactive," he said.

"The public can buy highways at a bargain now-the savings in cost probably will more than offset the interest charges on road bonds. Relief of unemployment might well be concentrated on road and street construction that has been well tested and found efficient," he concluded.

The Luther League Convention

Lutheran Young people assembled for convention at Thief River Falls, September 26th and 27th will hear Rev. Martin Norstad of Minneapolis, Vice-President of the International Luther League, deliver the convention sermon Sunday morning. Rev. Norstad also addresses the gathering at the Sunday afternoon session.

The convention theme, "The Challenge of God to Modern Youth", is slated for discussion on Saturday.

A Choral Union concert, under the direction of Rev. A. L. Swenson of Baudette, Minnesota, closes the convention.

Rev. Morris N. Peterson of Greenbush, Minnesota, is president of the leagues of the Thief River Falls Circuit.

Fire Destroys Many Homes

One of the worst forest fires that has raged in this part of the country since the Baudette fire in 1910, cut loose in some peat bogs southeast of Grygla on Friday and turned the country east of that village and around Four towns into a roaring mass of flames and smoke.

Several people in that community were burned to death and many a nice farm home was reduced to only a pile of ashes.

Several hundred head of livestock were burned to death, the biggest part of these being sheep. All the chickens and turkeys were killed on some of farms.

One man who had made a trip up there on Sunday reported to us that he saw many dead game birds and deer, and along one road he saw a fine team that had burned to death with the harnesses on.

H. F. Risberg of Orrin, N. D., was a visiter in town on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Neil Larson and T[illegible] Larson of St. Hilaire visited at the home of Mrs. A. E. Anderson on Sunday.

The Floating White House

THE Mayflower, a wooden, coal-burning vessel, was built at Clydebank, Scotland, in 1897, and used as a private yacht by a wealthy New York business man.

During the Spanish-American war it was purchased by Uncle Sam, converted into a gunboat and spent much time in Cuban waters, capturing several prizes. It was returned to the Caribbean sea when trouble broke out in Santo Domingo; later it cruised in European waters, but was returned in time to perform the most interesting service of conveying the special envoys of Russia and Japan to Portsmouth, New Hampshire, when peace terms which ended the Russo-Jap scrap were arranged.

Congress authorized its use as "The Presidential Yacht," in 1907. Five Presidents, Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding and Coolidge, have trod her decks.

A slim, trim-looking craft, the Mayflower is 341 feet long, 36 feet beam, draws about 18 feet of water, makes about 15 miles an hour, now burns oil, carries four six-pound guns and has a crew of 8 officers and 187 men, including 24 marines and a chaplain. It has sleeping quarters for the President, his wife, 14 guests and the crew.

Equipped with reception, smoking and dining rooms, library, piano, graphophone, orchestra and radio, the most luxuriously equipped naval vessel we have, free from military spirit, embodying the private and peaceful atmosphere of a mansion, the Mayflower offers a welcome means of escape from the strains which rest upon our Chief Executive which has been enjoyed more frequently by President and Mrs. Coolidge than either of his predecessors.

Son Is Accused of Father's Murder

Arrested While Escorting Body to Burial Place.

Kansas City.—Bartholomew J. Scannell, thirty-three, was walking toward the baggage car in which the body of his sixty-three-year-old father had been transported from Florida to be buried here beside his mother, when two city detectives arrested him for the murder of his father.

"You are under arrest," the officers told him.

"Why?" Scannell queried.

"On request of the sheriff of Jacksonville, Fla., we were asked to hold you in connection with your father's death," O. A. Lindsey, one of the detectives, answered, while G. A. Carter, his partner was putting handcuffs on Scannell.

Father Found Murdered.

Scannell's father, John F. Scannell, a poultry farmer living on a six-acre farm near Dinsmore, Fla., eleven miles north of Jacksonville, was found murdered five days before.

Apparently the crime had been committed two days before the body was found in a small shed. An ax had been used by the killer. Sheriff W. B. Calhoun claims to have an eye-witness of the slaying.

Protesting he knew nothing about the death of his father until he was notified at Tampa, Fla., young Scannell requested permission to have the plans for the funeral carried out.

Scannell said that he would return to Florida gladly. There was no motive for him to have killed his father, he asserted, indicating that debts on his father's farm exceeded the $2,000 insurance.

Had Other Property.

A dispatch from Florida, however, said that the father was thought to have had other property besides the farm. Herbert Taylor, Tampa, said to be a close friend of Scannell, also is accused.

The information against Scannell came from W. H. Higginbotham and his two brothers, D. R. and Lee, who lived near the elder Scannell's farm.

The Scannells formerly lived in Kansas City, where the son graduated from high school. His mother died about two years ago.

Scannell said his father went to Florida and settled there about two years ago.

Short Note Arrives Late for Romance

Princeton, Ind.—A romance which had its beginning during the World war brought its first result recently, but faded almost as rapidly as it came to light.

When Miss Anna May Miller was employed in the Jeffersonville (Ind.) government quartermaster depot, she wrote her name and address on a slip of paper and pinned it to a shirt which she had made.

Recently a letter came from a soldier stationed in Hawaii, who had received the shirt, answering her letter. But its writer now is Mrs. Harvey Deering and mother of three children.

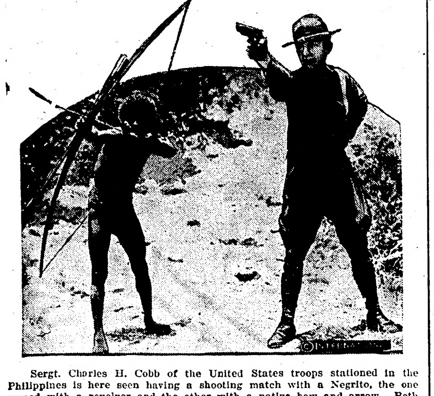
Sees After 20 Years; Anxious to View Film

New Orleans.—"One of the first things I want to see is a movie, and they tell me this Marline Dietrich is pretty to look at, too," Joseph Forsythe, who at seventy-one has just regained his sight through an operation, said recently.

The sugar cane planter had been blind twenty years.

"Country folks didn't get to see movies much in 1911 before I went blind," he explained.

Revolver Versus Bow and Arrow



Sergt. Charles H. Cobb of the United States troops stationed in the Philippines is here seen having a shooting match with a Negrito, the one armed with a revolver and the other with a native bow and arrow. Both are excellent marksmen and were able to give each other pointers in the handling of the weapons.

Hen Kills Eaglets Placed in Her Care

Cleveland.—Two of the three eaglets which were hatched recently in the biological laboratory of Western Reserve university have died, while the third is thriving.

The two died of injuries inflicted by their foster-mother, a setting hen, in stepping on them. It was believed the three birds were the first eagles ever hatched in captivity.

Doll's Leg in Child's Lung

Utica, N. Y.—The leg of a celluloid doll was removed from the lung of Agnes Winkleman, fifteen years old, here recently. The girl fell while running with the doll in her mouth, and the leg found lodgment in her nasal passages.

New Turk Language Is Proving Problem

Commission Reaches Letter 'B' After 2 Years Toil.

Istanbul, Turkey.—Making the new Turkish language is proving a difficult task. A commission has been sitting at Angora for over two years composing the grammar and the dictionary. But in the latter it has not got beyond the letter B, and the former is only just about to be released to the public.

The difficulties are great. It is being based on the French Larousse dictionary, every word in which is to have a new Turkish equivalent. As Turkish was never a very rich language and as all the Arabic and Persian words are being eliminated, it means that a large proportion of the vocabulary has to be invented.

Turkish, too, never had any modern scientific or psychological terms, and so these, again, which constitute such a large part of modern vocabularies, have to be created. The commissioners try to find Turkish roots out of which they can legitimately compose the equivalents of modern European scientific terminology.

In the letter A alone the new words invented amount to over 10,000. Many Turks say they are unpalatable mouthfuls and will never be used by the ordinary man. They accuse the commissioners of inventing a literary language different from the vernacular, which was exactly one of the dangers they were set to avoid.

Texas Students Find Evidence of Old Race

Lubbock, Texas.—Human skeletons and implements of a civilization which existed about 1,800 years ago were unearthed alongside the Tecolote river near Las Vagas, N. M., by members of the 1931 Texas Technological college archeological expedition.

Digging in ruins, the eleven students who comprised the party found several skeletons—presumably of Indians, who lived there centuries before this country was discovered—and arrowheads, stone drills and other articles.

A study of Aztec culture at Mexico City has been planned tentatively for the college's 1932 expedition.

Planes in U. S. Increase 417 in Last Six Months

Washington.—Aviation's increasing popularity is illustrated in Department of Commerce figures showing 417 more airplanes in use July 1 than January 1. Increases in the first six months of the year were shown in both licensed craft and in licensed pilots and mechanics.

The number of licensed pilots increased by almost 1,000, from 15,280 to 16,238. There were 445 licensed women pilots and five women mechanics.

Licensed aircraft increased by 104—from 7,358 to 7,458. New York State had the largest number, 225. Illinois was second and California third. These three states also led in pilots and mechanics as well as in total aircraft. New York, July 1, had 1,190 aircraft, licensed and unlicensed; California was second and Illinois third. In pilots they ranked California first, then New York and Illinois.

Gliders were most numerous in California, with Michigan second and New York third. There were 100 licensed gliders and 1,107 unlicensed.

Angler Believes Catfish Ate Water Moccasin

Sulphur, Okla.—Will a fish eat a snake? That is the question J. I. Young, veteran sportsman and fisherman, is attempting to answer.

Examining his lines one evening, Young discovered a large water moccasin on a hook. Not wishing to remove a live snake from the hook in the darkness, he decided to leave it on the line until morning.

When he "ran" the line the next morning he found a forty-pound catfish on the hook which the evening before had held the snake.

Veteran Smithy Adds Garage to His Shop

East Kingston, N. H.—With the rise of motor vehicle popularity in recent years, many a village smithy has gone out of business. But Joe Lawrence seems to have solved this problem very nicely. For many years a blacksmith, he now operates a combination garage and blacksmith shop, catering to both motorists and horsemen as they come along.

Little Red Hen Runs Nest Time by Clock

Kinston, N. C.—A little red hen quits her nest regularly every day at 6:15 a. m., 12 o'clock noon and 5:45 p. m. for food and water, says W. R. Brinkley, her owner. One of her eggs, Brinkley claims, is flat shaped and bears a clock dial, a complete circle with 12 regularly spaced notches on it.

They looked at each other and as they looked a little moisture came to their eyes. They breathed fast like those near exhaustion. Neither uttered a word as they turned and pushed their runners toward the smoke. Nearing the place whence it proceeded they saw back in the timber, now bare of foliage, the hull and mast of a large shallop. Built upon it and around the mast was a little house with gray bark sides and small windows of isinglass. Alongside the hull and reaching upward some three fathoms a stone chimney had been built. At the steps leading to its door they got the grateful odor of frying fish. Suddenly a white man of middle age opened the door and looked down upon them with astonishment.

"In the name o' God who are you?" he asked in Dutch.

"Wanderers in the waste who have lived through a dozen miracles," Amos answered in the same language. "I think that you are an angel at the gate o' Paradise."

"Are you the lost men that Miss Weld and her brother have been looking for?" the Dutchman asked.

"The very same men," Amos answered. "This is Mr. Heathers. My name is Todkill."

"Well, well! We scoured the lake for you and some friendly Indians were helping us. I am Nicholas Van Brocklin. Miss Weld left a letter here for Mr. Heathers. Come in, come in and share my food and drink and shelter. I'm as lonely as a buck deer in the summer."

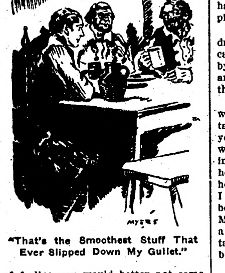
"I snum! This is splendidious!" the old pioneer exclaimed. "I'm kind o' slewed with happiness."

Amos and Robert sat on a rustic lounge covered with a beaver-skin robe. For a moment neither spoke. There was a grateful sense of warmth in the room.

Amos blew his nose and wiped his cheek and said presently, "I'm made o' hard stuff, but now I reckon we're like the boy who went off with Satan and by and by got back to his father's house."

Robert read the letter from Peggy aloud to Amos. These are its words:

"Dear Robert: We have spent a month in the wilderness trying to find you. I think that you may wonder why, but I am sure that if you have kept the medallion and have had the patience and the curiosity to wrest from its embrace the secret which it held, you will know why I have been glad to endure hardship and peril for your sake. It may be all in vain but I had to do my best. I pray God that this may fall in your hands. If it does it will open my heart and mind to you. Whatever you may have done I wish you to know that they are filled with the charity of St. Paul and of Jesus Christ. The magistrates, the church and every one I meet in Boston believe you to be in hiding because of your guilt. I do not share their opinion. It has been hard to stand against them but I stand. In the present state of feeling you would better not come to the colony. Take a ship for Holland at New Amsterdam. Let Todkill come and tell me what you have done and, if you wish it, I will go to you. We could meet at my father's house in dear old England.



"That's the Smoothest Stuff That Ever Slipped Down My Gullet."

"We have remained here to the last day and must now be going. I give this the caress you once begged of me not in vain.

"Yours faithfully,
"Peggy Weld."

Robert lifted the rose-scented sheet of paper to his lips and kissed it.

"Well, boys, supper will be ready in a minute," said Van Brocklin, as he took the fish and potatoes from the fire and began setting the table. He descended to the hold through a hatch in the floor and brought up butter and cold baked beans and bread and pumpkin sauce and a jug and a bottle of wine. He gave each of his guests a dram of gin and molasses called "black strap."

"That's the smoothest stuff that ever slipped down my gullet," said Amos with a shake of his right foot.

They spent a most delightful hour at the table.

Robert had thrown off his depression and was in a mood to celebrate the loss of it. His fear for his beloved friend William had left him, for it was clear that all the brethren were convinced of his innocence. As they ate, Amos told of Tawandoha and his melancholy fate in the far mountain country.

"Old Tawandoha!" the Dutchman exclaimed. "Always I bowed my head to him. He would never drink firewater. He was the bravest fighter, the wisest chief in the Long House. He was humane. Many a white man owes his life to old Tawandoha. He had a noble dignity and that was his only ornament. He would have no feathers and no gewgaws on his person."

Their host lived at Fort Orange on the North river. His sons and himself traded with the savages. In August the great hurricane which swept over the country drove their shallop ashore and bedded her so fast in the rising ground that they had not been able to get her back to water. They had built the little house above her to serve as a camp and headquarters on the Lake of the Iroquois, and brought timber for another shallop. The early deep snow had delayed their moving. His sons were over in the west end of the Long House more than a hundred leagues away. If Amos and Robert would stay and guard his camp he would go home for Christmas and return as soon as possible with sleds and help for his moving. Then Amos and Robert could go down to the fort with the party.

Sitting by the fireside with pipes and tobacco Nicholas said that the Iroquois would be coming south in a month or so with sledloads of meat and many captives. The meat taken in the upper mountains would come down the lake bound for the Long House. Unlike the nomad tribes of the north the Iroquois had learned to be a provident people but were quite as cruel as their neighbors. Many white men had been tortured and slain by them. They were now at peace with the Dutch but it was like thin ice, liable to break any moment. Power was the only thing they respected. White men would be secure when the savages were destroyed and not till then. Yes, he traded strong water for skins. If they didn't get it from him they would get it from others. He knew it was bad for them, but poisoned corn was also bad for crows. They were pests, and anything bad for them was good for the white man. You might as well try to make a hog fit for the parlor as try to civilize a savage.

Thus he voiced the sophistries of the rum trader, but Amos and Robert were in no mood to argue with him. After all they had seen they were quite willing to agree that savages were nearer to the beast than to men. Yet they were human, with certain admirable virtues which had rightly given hope to the good fathers in the north and to the rulers in New England.

The Dutchman gave them hot water for a bath, ointment with which to rid themselves of unpleasant company acquired in the Indian camps, and insisted that they occupy the two beds, while he took the lounge. They had a night of rest the like of which they had not known since leaving the hospitable roof of Madame Hebert.

In the morning, after a meal of dried fish and potatoes and blueberry cake with a refreshing hot drink made by stewing dried leaves of spearmint and raspberry, Van Brocklin washed the dishes and left his new friends.

These were his parting words: "You will find meat and flour and vegetables and drink in the hold. Help yourselves freely to anything you want. There is an abundance of fish in the lake. You have only to cut holes in the ice and bait and set your hooks. I shall return within ten days. I do not think that any Indians will be coming down the lake before then. Most of my strong water is buried in a snowdrift. If you stand firm and talk Dutch to them, they'll give you no bother."

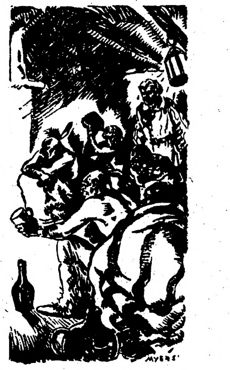
CHAPTER XI

The Coming of James Rosewell and Its Revelations

They had three delightful days of rest and comfort in the interesting boat-house of Nicholas Van Brocklin. Late in the third day a bitter wind from the northwest with snow began to whistle in the chimney and hiss against the bark walls. The bare branches of beech, birch and maple sang like whips. The frozen trees creaked and groaned, and now and then a report like a postol shot rang through the timbered slope when links of frost were broken. Leagues of the forest roof were bending and billowing in the blast. It reminded Amos of artillery fire when a great tree near them crashed down, clearing its way to the ground. They brought in a good store of wood.

Suddenly a band of twelve Iroquois hunters arrived, crowded into the house and literally took possession of it. They took off their racquets at the door. Their leader spoke a word of greeting. Then they shook themselves like dogs and sat down facing the fire, their blankets over their heads. There was no note of ill-nature in their conduct, but for a long time they were silent. Indians gave freely to honored guests. So presently they arose and began to help themselves to the stores of the little trading house—no doubt they felt entitled to its best hospitality. In spite of all the efforts of Amos to restrain them they ransacked the hold and drank all the wine and strong water they could find. They seized the meat, fish and vegetables, put them all in Van Brocklin's big brass kettle, boiled and devoured them. That evening the neat and cleanly room had become a noisome pen of prostrate, ill-smelling savages on the beds, lounge and the floor. Some of them were drunk but not sufficiently so to make them violent or quarrelsome.

The storm abated next morning and there being nothing to eat in the cabin, the Indians went away on their racquets. Amos and Robert hung the bed covers on a line for the day, washed the linen and scrubbed the floors, for the house had suddenly become a rookery. It was no light matter to be visited by a number of savages.



Some of Them Were Drunk.

The white men were on short rations of fish and wild duck—two of which Robert brought down with a musket which hung in the cabin—until about ten days had passed. The Dutchman came with sleds and two helpers and two unexpected guests—Mr. James Rosewell, of Boston, and his guide and protector, an officer from the fort below. He had come by ship to the island of the Manhados, then up the North river in a pinnace to the Dutch Fort Orange. There Van Brocklin had given him news of the men he sought. He coldly shook hands with Robert and Amos, saying: "I have come a long way to find you."

"Thanks. It is a friendly thing to do," said Robert. "I am glad to tell you that we do not need help."

"But there are those in Boston who need your help," Rosewell rejoined.

"Who needs my help?"

"I reckon you know as well as I that William Heydon is suffering punishment for a crime. Most people are convinced that you committed it. I have come here on my own responsibility to ask you as a gentleman to tell me the truth and I rely wholly on your sense of justice and right."

"Tell we what has happened to my friend William Heydon," said Robert.

"He is suffering for adultery with one Mabel Hartley, once a servant in your house. At first she swore it on William. She fell ill and confessed to Harry Vane that she might have been in error as to the man. Later she said in my presence that her mind had changed—that as she gave more thought to the matter she was convinced that you and not William had been with her that night. Two days later the woman died of a fever in her lungs. William was released from prison and put on the limits of the town pending your return, the inhabitants and certain members of the court, especially Governor Vane, believing him to be innocent. But he has to wear around his neck a noose of hempen rope with a tail two feet long. This is a heavy burden, and it is your duty to him and to his friends to remove it."

It was a well-spoken argument, full of the note of sincerity. They were standing on the cleaned ice at the edge of the lake. Robert paced up and down in the shoveled area. He stood a moment looking off at the snow-laden forest. His face had paled. Both Amos and Rosewell watched him with interest. Amos' hands were trembling a little. There was a touching note of despair in Robert's voice as he turned and said:

"A rope on his neck! Every morning he gets up to be hanged again by the neck and to be gazed at by the crowd. My God! This is torture! It is burning a man up by inches. And Harry Vane is governor!"

How to train BABY'S BOWELS

Babies, bottle-fed or breast-fed, with any tendency to be constipated, would thrive if they received daily half a teaspoonful of this old family doctor's prescription for the bowels.

That is one sure way to train tiny bowels to healthy regularity. To avoid the fretfulness, vomiting, crying, failure to gain, and other ills of constipated babies.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is good for any baby. For this, you have the word of a famous doctor. Forty-seven years of practice taught him just what babies need to keep their little bowels active, regular; keep little bodies plump and healthy. For Dr. Caldwell specialized in the treatment of women and little ones. He attended over 3500 births without loss of one mother or baby.

SHYNESS TRAIT OF MANY GREAT MEN

Famous Figures of History Among Them.

There is ample authority for the assertion that President Hoover is shy. President Coolidge was also shy, and so was President Wilson. No one ever noticed shyness in President Roosevelt, but the list of our shy Presidents is a long one.

Grant was shy, and some said Lincoln was. That is, they seemed shy to some of the people they knew, or met—who wrote their personal impressions of them afterward. Jefferson was a highbrow and no "mixer"; you could not slap him on the back. There was nothing of the shrinking violet in John Adams, but his eminent son, John Quincy, was reserved and distant. Henry Clay thought he was a prim little Puritan, as cold as a fish, when he met him at Ghent.

George Washington, according to a clergyman who knew him, was "shy, silent, slow and cautious." This clergyman, Rev. Jonathan Boucher, was an Anglican churchman who returned to England at the outbreak of the Revolution and the manuscript containing his recollections of the first President was recently sold at auction in London for $95. Rev. Mr. Boucher saw Washington socially and also in connection with the education of a young relative. His testimony has some value.

So many Presidents of the United States have been described as shy, even the most eminent of them, that shyness must have been exaggerated as a personal handicap in the struggle for success. What seems to be genuine shyness may be overcome by a strong will, ambition and determination to get results.

Outside of public life some of the most successful men have been said to be shy. Henry Ford has impressed many people as very diffident. Even the late J. P. Morgan, prince of financiers, shunned publicity as if he were obsessed with the desire for privacy. He would never attempt to make a speech. An audience of schoolboys frightened him. But even an orator may be naturally solitary. Some great actors have been shy. Edwin Booth, who was accustomed to take five curtain calls in succession, was said to be. And what of President Hindenburg? He is very different from William.

Shyness signifies no lack of essential strength: it is a superficial, not a fundamental, weakness.—Springfield Republican.

Frown on Lion Hunters Killing From Airplanes

Hunting lions from airplanes is distinctly out, in all parts of Africa where the British writ rules. The open veldt of the great African game country offers great possibilities for cross-country coursing in automobiles, and easy landing for airplanes. Hence, sportsmen have been rather overshooting lions. This is regarded as bad for several reasons. It threatens the sport with extinction, but sportsmen are joined in their anxiety by zoologists, who do not wish to see another splendid wild animal added to the list of extinct species. Conservationists and animal ecologists also see in the lion a useful regulator for the numbers of antelope and other grazing animals, which without some natural check might increase too rapidly and overgraze the range. Only in thickly populated districts, where lions become troublesome stock killers and potential menaces to human life, is exterminative hunting tolerated.

Looking to Alaska for Supply of Pencil Wood

The pencil wood supply near large factories is practically exhausted and the industry is now investigating the possibility of utilizing Alaska red cedar, the finest-grained wood of the Northwest. Cedar wood intended for lead pencils must be soft, light yet strong, close and straight-grained and free from defects. The older the tree the better pencil wood it makes. The wood from the heart of aged logs that have lain in the deep woods for years makes admirable pencil material. A possible substitute for cedar in lead pencils is Pacific coast myrtle. Its wood is light, straight-grained, well-scented and of good color. Both cedar and myrtle woods are immune to the effects of quick climate changes.

There is a good deal of sneakiness to some tact.

DUAL BANK SYSTEM FAVORED BY BANKER

State and National Institutions Supplement Each Other in Serving Country's Varied Financial Needs

RECENT suggestions that all banks in the United States be under Federal jurisdiction, doing away with the chartering of banks by the various states recalls the opposition to this plan presented at the recent convention of the American Bankers Association by R. S. Hecht of New Orleans, Chairman of its Economic Policy Commission. Mr. Hecht said:

"There are just as good reasons why there should be state as well as national banks, as that there should be state as well as a national government. I do not think that analogy is far-fetched. The states should not surrender all political jurisdiction to the central government, and the local business life of the states should not be made to surrender all control over financial functions to national financial instrumentalities. There are many variations of business conditions from state to state and there are special fiscal requirements of the various states.

"It is entirely logical, therefore, that the states should retain the right to charter banks so as to mold and direct their affairs in accordance with the states' governmental and business requirements and keep them adapted to localized sentiment and conditions.

"The argument is sometimes advanced that the dual system jeopardizes the life of the Federal Reserve System because under it there is a large group of banks that are free to remain out of or to withdraw from the system. Facts and figures prove that this is a specious argument.

"It is true that there has been some shifting from national to state charters especially in cases of mergers of large national banks with banks operating under state charters. However, the Federal Reserve System was not weakened in this process because the merged institutions almost universally retained their membership in the system on a voluntary basis. Moreover, the records show that state bank members are just as good members of the system as national banks and the ratio of state bank resources in the Federal Reserve System is constantly growing. In 1922, national banks held about 65 per cent of the resources of reserve members, and state banks about 35 per cent, while in 1929, the nationals held only 60 per cent and state banks 40 per cent.

Banking Systems Help Each Other

"Reciprocally the state and national banks systems have helped each other. If the national banking law has served in some respects as something of a model code toward which state banking laws more and more have approached year by year, so have the state codes developed valuable reforms which have suggested improvements for the national laws. A great many undesirable competitive inequalities have been wiped out by this mutual evolutionary process and further progress along the line of uniformity so far as is desirable is anticipated.

"However, I do not believe that it is a disadvantage to have two banking codes that differ in some respects. It is quite probable that the state banking code in many instances represents a closer adjustment to local conditions than could be had under the national banking laws, and this is a situation that should be retained. There should, however, not be competition between the two banking codes. Competition should be between banks themselves and not between the laws under which they operate. The effort to offer too great allurements in one code as against the other could lead only to weak banking laws. But I do think that there should be the alternative opportunities that now exist which banking institutions and local business interests may choose, so that they can function or conduct their business relationships under that banking code which best meets the conditions of the times and of the place as they see them.

"This has been illustrated in both directions. In states where such unsound measures as the guarantee of deposits were operative state banks had the opportunity to escape the baleful effect of such laws. On the other hand, when a court decision was handed down in Worcester, Massachusetts, which rendered uncertain the position of trust assets acquired by a national bank through a merger with a state bank, it was a real advantage for national banks affected to take out and operate under a state charter, either on a temporary or a permanent basis, as circumstances make expedient.

"In my opinion, bankers, national as well as state, should combat the thought that conceives of depriving us of the vitalizing benefits of our dual system."

Finance Fights Erosion

Farm terracing to stop erosion is of major importance in Noble County, Oklahoma, the county agent said, and so one of the county's national banks bought five farm levels to be loaned to farmers without charge. The machines were immediately put to use and the farmers are showing keen interest in terracing. Two terracing schools were started for adults and 4-H Club boys.

BUS COMPETITION HITS RAILROADS

Bankers Association President Asks If Unfair Aid Is Given Motorized Transport—For Rail Mergers.

NEW YORK.—Fair treatment for the railroads in respect to highway motor competition was called for by Rome C. Stephenson, President American Bankers Association, in a recent address here. He also strongly endorsed "sound economic railway consolidation" and praised President Hoover for his initiative in this respect.

"I am very strongly of the opinion that one of the measures which would help materially to put back business where it ought to be is the Eastern four-system plan of railroad consolidation as announced recently following negotiations instituted by President Hoover," said Mr. Stephenson. "Its adoption by the Interstate Commerce Commission would tend to stabilize the transportation industry, facilitate operation and exert a favorable influence on business in general.

"It is a fact well known to business leaders that our railroads are now facing a crisis. Not only do they need protective laws to meet competitive situations arising from increased use of our highways and waterways by other carriers, but they need unification such as the proposed four-system plan provides. Our President has acted wisely in assuming a leadership in this respect and his move deserves the support of every clear-thinking citizen."

Mr. Stephenson declared that the railroads have served this country "so superlatively well that we are prone in our public affairs to overlook our dependence upon them and our obligations to them. The past, present and future progress of the United States is inseparably bound up with their welfare. In neglecting just consideration for them we are even more neglectful of the public's best economic interests.

A Question of Public Interest

"We are confronted with the question as to how much more the public economic interest will stand an invasion of the welfare of the railroads by forces and difficulties not of their own creating and not within the scope of their own unaided powers to combat," said Mr. Stephenson. "I refer especially to new competitions that are undermining the hard-earned position of the railroads, not only with the aid of natural economic forces but also through the aid of government policies which, positively or negatively, tend to give these competitors undue advantages over the railroads.

"It goes without saying that the railroads have no right, nor claim any, so far as I have been able to discern, to complain at legitimate competition in the field of transportation, for the public is entitled to the best possible transportation at the lowest practical cost. But equally does it go without saying that this cannot be fairly brought about by using, or by failing to use, the taxing powers of government to enable competitive methods of transportation to do things they could not otherwise do as unaided private enterprises, particularly when such action impairs the invested rights held in good faith by great masses of our people in established enterprises that are serving the public well."

Mr. Stephenson said it was not his purpose to argue against such competitive transportation as the highway passenger motorbus and motor truck as such, when conducted under proper conditions and in keeping with public welfare and benefit. He declared, however, there is need for serious consideration whether such competition is being developed under conditions that are unfair to the railroads, because either the outright or obscure aid of government policy is the deciding economic factor in that competition.

Would Investigate Bus Traffic

Railroad rights of way, he declared, represent tremendous capital investments, on which the railroads have also heavy current costs to meet. "They pay every day a million dollars in taxes and most of this is on their rights of way," he said. "Also they spend daily over two million dollars additional for the proper maintenance of way." He asserted that the motorbuses have not had to pay for their rights of way in any sense that the railroads paid for theirs.

"They have simply taken possession of public highways built by public funds, both state and national," he continued, "and they have extensively made those highways vastly less comfortable, less safe and less serviceable for private motorists and others who are contributing chiefly to their creation and maintenance."

Mr. Stephenson declared that all these matters should be thoroughly inquired into by competent public bodies, both state and national, with a view of determining the equities and basic public economic interests involved, "particularly in respect to their effects upon the nation's railroads.

"I venture to say," he added, "that such inquiries would show whether it is to the public interest to let things remain as they are, whether the situation calls for a new basis of motorbus and truck taxes to satisfy the equities of the case or whether it would call for such drastic action as the exclusion of this traffic from our public general highways, and the requirement that, even as the railways, it provide as a part of its own private capital investment its own rights of way and for its own maintenance of way out of operating income."

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, September 25, 1931. Volume 21; Number 22.

An Ounce of Prevention Worth a Pound of Cure

We have had rain in this part of the state almost every day the past week and, it seems kind of queer that the hand of fate could not have let this rain have come a little sooner and averted the tremendous losses suffered from forest fires in Beltrami and Lake of the Woods counties.

After we read the Baudette Region for last week and found out the facts as put forth therein by Editor Noonan, we wonder if it would not have paid someone a big dividend on his investment to have spent a little time before hand in checking or putting out these peat bog fires.

We don't say that anyone should go out and dig them out by hand as, surely they must have a few dredges left out of the army of them that was used a few years ago when they took upon themselves the work of draining these northern counties to death and, by so depleting the natural water flow and ruin their only fire protection thereby putting the settlers at the door of death and ruination of which there was plenty of both in the recent forest fires.

With so much modern machinery to be had it seems funny that the state could not go out into these worthless peat bogs and dig out the fires and use high pressure water pumping equipment to drown out what they could not dig out.

Now the state has to help the ones that were burned out and, yet they can not replace all what they lost to say nothing about what the surroundings look like where they are going back to try again to make a living. For as much or a little more money as will be needed now for help this overburned area could have been saved from total ruination.

Band Practice

There will be band practice every Tuesday evening in the Holt school house, until further notice. Several new members have joined the organization the past few times it has met, and there is still room for more.

Rev. Redal, director of the local band, announces that any one who wishes to join now should see him so that he can have you get the instruments that are most needed.

Amos touched the shoulder of his young friend with a curious tenderness in his big rough hand, as he said:

"It's a hell of a fuss over a small matter. I'll go to Boston myself and swear that I done it. All the wives and old maids and young maids would be sayin' that they always knew I was a devil with the gals."

"Robert is the man to go," said Rosewell.

Amos answered: "I can tell ye that he will not go."

"I prefer that he speak for himself. If he refuses to go with me there will be no longer any doubt of his guilt."

"When I go to Boston I shall choose my own time and company," said Robert.

He went to the house to get his coat, for a cold blast was blowing down the lake.

"Cat's foot!" Amos exclaimed. "Ye say that the people o' Boston think that Robert is guilty. I reckon there's one who don't think so."

"Who is that?" Rosewell demanded.

"Peggy Weld. I'll bet my head on it I am right."

Amos had been whittling as he spoke. He rested his knife and looked at the newcomer, who said:

"I am not authorized to express Miss Weld's opinions."

"Yes, I know," said Amos. "Ye haven't thought 'bout yerself a minute. Ye're so interested in justice and right that ye've app'inted yerself to look into the facts, and ye've traveled three hundred leagues in doin' it. I declare, Rosewell, ye're one o' the saints o' God. O' course ye'll tell Peggy that ye didn't know any more 'bout Robert when ye left here than ye did when ye come."

"What I say to anyone will depend wholly on my own judgment and conscience," Rosewell answered.

Robert returned from the house. He brought the puzzle locket which Peggy had loaned to him when he left her.

"How long do you stay with us?" he asked.

Rosewell answered: Only a few minutes. My ship will be leaving New Amsterdam in nine days. I shall have to hurry to make it. Before I go I have a question to ask you. The truth involves no peril to you. Being beyond the jurisdiction of the court you can safely go to the Dutch town and take a ship for Holland. The happiness of your friend depends on your answer. Are you the man whom the constable found with Mabel Hartley in a thicket the night you left Boston?"

"You have no right to ask me that question, and I refuse to answer it," said Robert.

With perfect composure Rosewell answered:

"Then my work is finished, and we will return to the fort. We shall lodge tonight at a Dutch trading post twelve miles south of here. If you change your mind, as I hope you may, you can find us there until eight o'clock tomorrow morning."

"I have this little trinket that belongs to Peggy Weld," said Robert. "She let me take it the night I left you and her and others at the governor's house. I expected to return it the next day when we were to see each other. As I may never see her again, will you have the kindness to take it back to her? It is an old keepsake of her family, and I am sure that she will want to have it."

"I shall see that she gets it," Rosewell answered coldly.

Forthwith he and the Dutch officer set out on their journey to the south.

"He didn't like that," said Amos with a chuckle and a flirt of his foot. "There's pages o' history behind this journey o' his. Peggy has turned cold on his hands. She stands for ye ag'in' the whole town. He knows that she is in love with ye. He come here to show her that he's a better man than you be. He'll make out that ye confessed to him, but Peggy is no fool. She'll grig him good."

The Dutchman swore when they told him of the visit of the Iroquois hunters.

"If I had been here they would have been more careful of their behavior. They are like animals, quick to see it if you are a little scared of them. Then they'll walk on your face. They know that the fort is behind me. They call me the 'Son of Thunder' and I treat them like a lot of school boys."

They helped the Dutchman with his packing. Next morning in good weather they left the trading post with the Dutchman and his men, the casks, bedding and kitchen utensils lashed upon sleds. After four days of hard travel they reached the fort on a hill overlooking the North river and a stretch of cleared lands west of it. At a little inn they learned that Rosewell had left some days before in a sleigh. For a week the river had been thinly iced. They could only wait for it to be well covered.

"Let yer lungs rest," the old pioneer said to Robert. "Ye trust to Amos. His mazzard has done a little contrivin'. He'll shoot ye down to open water comf'table and as fast as ye want to ride. All we need is ice without too much snow on it. I reckon this north wind will put a stout roof on that river in two or three days."

The reckoning of Amos was not far wrong. Within a week laden sleighs drawn by horses were crossing the river, and the young folks sped over the glimmering ice plane on their skates. Meanwhile Amos had made friends with the village carpenter. The two had built a sled, with a beam of unusual width, and stout enough to carry a short mast. Robert found them at work in the shop.

"What is that?" he asked.

"Well, sir, she looks like a Dutch dog, but she's an iceboat," said his friend. "All she needs now is a sail and a pair o' sharp iron shoes that'll grab hold o' the ice. She'll be rigged proper tonight. I don't know how ye feel, but Amos has nary a cloud in his sky."

"I am as happy as a caged squirrel," Robert answered. "When do we start?"

"Tomorrow at sunrise and with a small tent and a store of beef, bread and b'iled eggs. If the wind keeps up we'll do a lot o' slipping' afore dark—ye set yer mind a chawin' that cud."

They sped away at daybreak with a stiff cold wind blowing down the river valley, their goods and provisions lashed to the deck and Amos on the stern where he could manage the steering lever and the rope. They went in long tacks even faster than the wind at times.

"I'm like a man on a horse that's runnin' away," said Amos with a laugh. "She's got the bit in her teeth, and I don't know how to stop her."

They were cold and hungry when at a bend in the ice plane Amos steered his curious craft in the lee of a high shore and skidded her into rough ice hard by the bank.

"Now, old mare, you stand there a while," said Amos. "Don't be so crazy to go. You'd starve us to death—you busy old bird. We're goin' to build a fire and warm up and get a fresh hold on happiness."

They went ashore and gathered wood. With flint and tinder and a pinch of gunpowder Amos got his fire going. Near it they sat on a rug of hemlock boughs and ate their food, with a bottle of good wine to help it on its way.

"That dinner has improved the look o' the world," said the pioneer as he arose and gathered up the remnants. "Amos has no fault to find. We'll shove her out into the wind and get aboard. The old mare will be as busy as a scared pismire in about a minute."

Soon they raced into a deep, shadowed vale between high mountains. Its crystal paving, sheltered from the wind, had a thin covering of hard snow. Here they made slower headway and had to do some hauling.

Rounding a bend as night was falling, they saw ahead of them on a long, wide, natural terrace the glimmering windows of a cabin. It was the home of a Dutch shepherd and tobacco grower. He and his family received them with joy and gave them food and lodging.

Snow fell in a windless night. So much of it that the iceboat was no longer of any use to the travelers. They gave it to the Dutchman, who took them many miles down the long ice way with his team and farm sled. A booby-hut had been fastened to the sled and the three men sat in it. Their host left them under the high rock cliffs on the west shore, that being as far as he thought it prudent to go with the weight of horses. From there Amos and Robert shouldered their packs and went on afoot. They carried letters from the Dutchman to the Dominie Bogardus and to Francis Molemacker who ran the Horse Mill.

The afternoon was far spent when they came to the lofty river wall, the top of which was some two hundred feet above the ice plane on the northwestern corner of the island. On its summit was an Indian camp and a number of warriors and their chief, in his feathered head-dress, looking down upon them. Beyond this elevated tableland was a wooded wilderness with high rock ridges, inland, denuded by fire. They came soon to a low shore and sand hills made, no doubt, by strong west winds blowing over the strand at low water. Far southward they saw the smoke of a house rising above the forest and soon a rude roadway, bridged from the ice, over which sleighs and horses had lately traveled. They took this path in the snow and came before long to a log house in a large clearing. There they learned from farmer Van Dincklagen that they had come to "The Bouwerie in the Forest" and that New Amsterdam was less than two miles below. The farmer told them how to reach the Indian path which led southward to the city gate. They crossed Bestaver's brook and came to a high hill commanding the lower end of the island. The could see many roofs, the fort and its windmill and masts and rigging in the harbor.

"There we be at last!" Amos exclaimed. "The place where ye take water from this heathen land! Now silence and a prayer to God! I eye it as a piece o' Providence."

Descending the hill they crossed a boggy flat and came soon to a lake with a small island in the midst of it. At the "top of the town" was a wooden palisade of strong pickets driven into the ground. The gate, beyond a rude roadway called the Indian path, was wide enough to admit a team of horses abreast. A watchman halted them at the gate. Amos showed his letters and in Dutch dispelled all doubt of their good intentions. It was now quite dark, and the windows of the big warehouse of the West India company and in many small dwellings were aglow.

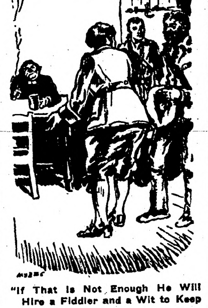
They went with their letter to the house of Dominie Bogardus on Pearl street, to which some children had directed them. The good man received them warmly and listened to their plans. Amos told him that they were Puritans who had been captured by the Indians. He told of their escape and of the Dutch trader through whose friendly offices they had arrived at Fort Orange. He spoke also of their deep sense of obligation to the Dutch which his young friend—a man of ample means—wished to signalize with a gift to the parish, and of their desire to take the first ship to Holland.

"You may have to wait long before you can get a ship," said the dominie. "Meanwhile I am sure that the director general will make you comfortable. Come with me. We will go to his house."

CHAPTER XII

How the Night in New Amsterdam Changed Their Plans

They went along the strand to the fort which stood near the water's edge. Within the enclosure of the fort they were admitted to the house of the director general, Mr. Wouter Van Twiller, who sat drinking with a jolly burgomaster. Amos describes the latter in his diary as "a proper lusty man, with a brain like a cork and a body like a sponge." The director general smoked silently as the dominie said: "Here are two worthy men just arrived from Fort Orange to take a ship for Holland. They are Protestants of substance and good manners, who have come down on the ice. They will be glad to pay for entertainment while they stay here."



"If That Is Not Enough He Will Hire a Fiddler and a Wit to Keep You Merry."

The jolly burgomaster spoke for his friend, so preoccupied with his pipe, his beer and this thoughts.

"God give you peace," he said as he shook their hands. "The governor will give you his best room and his best slave to serve you. If that is not enough he will hire a fiddler and a wit to keep you merry and a lady to curl your hair and tell you love stories."

Tempting Dog's Appetite

Nursing a sick dog, especially when it is in the convalescent stage, is not an easy task, as any dog owner who has been through it knows. One owner was having great difficulty in getting his dog to eat. He mentioned the matter to another dog owner, an old-timer who has been through much of it. Said he: "I got this from an old lady when I was a kid and I'm no spring chicken. You might think it's an old-fashioned notion, but I've tried it and never knew it to fail. Try the dog on a little smoked herring, just enough to get him started. It's great as an appetizer."

The owner followed the suggestion, and sure enough the dog ate the smoked herring, with relish, and then turned to a few other things. After a few days, with an occasional taste of smoked herring, the dog's appetite came back. Old-fashioned or not, the treatment was successful.—Brockton Enterprise

COLORFUL SEVILLE

A Milkman in Seville.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

WITH the revolution a matter of history, Seville, which a majority of visitors who travel down from Madrid and up from Cadiz call "The Most Spanish City in Spain," has settled down to its usual routine.

But in Seville, now scintillating, now sleepy, is discovered a Spain not of the drowsing past, nor yet of the bustling present; it is an indiscriminate mingling of both. Abiding through the centuries here on sun-swept slopes, the city has built for itself a dwelling place of traditions; but they are not a high wall hedging it about. Seville takes pride in her glorious past, treasures it, becomes frankly arrogant about it at times; but her chief love is life and the living of it.

Her lichen-covered churches she holds inviolate. Not one cobweb may be removed, nor a single crumbling block of hand-hewed stone be remortared; but, across a well-paved avenue, a steel-fabricated office building must incorporate every convenience of the modern builder's art.

Laden donkeys may, and do, wander willy-nilly through every downtown thoroughfare, but the driver of a limousine must keep his eyes open for "one-way street" signs and his ears alert for the traffic officer's whistle.

Seville's history is as colorful as one of the silken shawls that drape the shoulders of her dark-eyed senoritas, as varied as the moods of her people, as interesting as any story may well be that depicts the romance of a town which has lived through the rise, glory, and decay of half a dozen nations.

The city's actual genesis is lost, hidden by the obscuring veil which shrouds much of the remote past of the Mediterranean, and which was only slightly torn aside by the adventuring Phoenicians, and later by the warrior-merchants of Carthage.

But there was a Roman Seville. Of that ancient period definite traces remain. Some of the crumbling walls of the city were built under the direction of the Caesars. The Visigoths, following the fall of Rome's western empire, lingered for a brief three centuries in Seville. The Jews, too, from behind Byzantium came here to have their home, rose to positions of power, endured grievous persecution, passed, but left carved memories of their stay.

Gypsies Still There.

Likewise the gypsies came here, and here they yet remain, crowded together in noisy little and big families in Triana, the ragged suburb of Seville, across the Guadalquivir. Finally, the Moors possessed Seville. One must say finally because the city remains today something of a Moorish town. Saint Ferdinand brought it within the Christian fold some seven centuries ago; but all his might could not wipe out the Orient.

The picturesque Santa Cruz district of Seville, with its narrow, crooked streets and flat-roofed, companionable houses, has changed very little in the last thousand years. The city's famous and equally beloved Giralda is today much the same as when a Moorish architect completed it, in 1196, and the white-robed followers of Mohammed used it as a minaret from which to call the faithful to prayer

But Seville dwells not overmuch in reminiscences. She reverses her heroes of olden time, but it is the heroes of today that occupy her thoughts and newspapers. Annually she devotes many holidays in obeisance before ancient glories, but the days before and after are spent in widening her narrow streets to accommodate a rapidly increasing motor traffic and in building steel and concrete office buildings wherein to house her ever-expanding commercial enterprises.

She points with pride to where the caravels of the New world's conquerors anchored in the Guadalquivir river, but barely a stone's throw away electric cranes strive the day long with vast cargoes to and from the earth's four corners.

Alcazar, the old Moorish palace rebuilt to house the splendor of the courts of Andalusian kings, remains much the same as it was seven centuries ago; but immediately across the street the new Alfonso XIII hotel transplants one straightway to the luxury of up-to-date Paris, or London or New York.

Those fortunate individuals who come to southern Spain armed with letters of introduction to high officials and wealthy families go away with glowing accounts of the sumptuousness of life, of the lavish hospitality accorded visitors, and of the very modern manner of living in this only superficially modernized city.

Other earnest seekers after local color who visit Seville and, in their desire to know their Spain, live among the Sevillanos, endure the inconveniences of modest Spanish homes, spend long hours in crowded cafes to engage in endless discussions with the ever-talkative habitues, attend frequent festivals and bullfights. These folk carry away a vivid, glowing picture of a Seville en fiesta—colorful, rather noisy, highly picturesque.

Average Income Is Puny.

Only in rare instances does the foreigner come to know the true home life of the Sevillano. There is not much money per capita in Seville these days. To be sure, certain of the city's families are immensely wealthy and live in the style of oriental potentates and occidental plutocrats, while foreign residents are forced, for appearances' sake, to struggle along at a similar pace. But such folk are a statistical handful. Fully three-fourths of the town's population lives and has its being and is wholly happy on an income of around a dollar a day per person.

In many cases this income must cover the needs of an entire family, and some of Seville's families need much. But somehow there is always enough left over for the menfolk to afford a few hours each evening with convivial friends in a favorite coffee shop, and to secure a seat "in the sun" at the Sunday bullfight; and for the numerous children to purchase penny sweets, as occasion demands, from the howling huckster who passes the door each morning, accompanied by a congenial donkey laden with sticky lusciousness; and for the women of the family to have a new imitation tortoise-shell comb, a cobwebby lace mantilla, and a holeless pair of silk stockings—this last because the weaving of silk hosiery has in recent years become one of Spain's leading manufacturing industries.

The people of Seville blend past and present in their dress and in many of their customs. The high Spanish comb and lace mantilla of olden times are still worn here, perhaps more generally than in any other city of Spain. But the comb is more often than not perched precariously in modernly bobbed hair, while the mantilla covers a beautiful head filled with decidedly up-to-date feminine thoughts and ideas.

Racially, the people owe much to the Moorish residence in southern Spain. Brilliant black and brown eyes and complexions ranging from darkest sepia to the most delicate of creamy textures are strangely reminiscent of long generations of ancestors who dwelt beneath the Sahara sun. Intermingled with this great majority, however, one finds increasingly large percentage of the blue eyes and light hair of more Anglo-Saxon communities.

Olives and Cork.

Seville is an industrious city. Many of the city's activities revolve about the production and shipment of pickled olives and various grades of olive oil, for it is the central point of distribution for the richest olive-producing area in the world. There is an ancient local saying that the only genuine queen olives produced on earth are grown within seeing distance of the Giralda tower, the soil and climate of this region being particularly well suited to the full maturing of this class of the fruit.

Much of the cork insulation found in our modern electrical refrigerators and many of the cork disks in the metal caps of ginger ale—and other—bottles were shipped from the port of Seville. The world acknowledges no wrought iron more artistic than that fashioned by the gypsy families of Triana.

Seville's industries, however, are not permitted to interfere too radically with her moments of rest and relaxation. Every coffee shop (and there are scores of them in Seville) is a noisy stamping ground, humanity-choked, from early in the afternoon until long after midnight. Indeed, one may pass at any time during the day or night and see gesticulating knots of men crowded about cup-cluttered tables, talking, talking.

Of All Things!

"Mamma, why are the street car men on strike?"

"Because they want more money, my dear."

"Want more money? But they ride all day on the cars, for nothing!"—L'Illustre.

OBSESSION—TRAGEDY OF THE CAUSE

By Fannie Hurst

(©, 1931, McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THE blazing August fitted down like a red hot stove lid over Clancey street.

In its way, it reminded Etta of the blazing kind of fanaticism her father brought home to the ground floor, four-room apartment they occupied in a dingy brown tenement. Etta was sure, had you taken her father's temperature any of the twenty-four hours of the day, he would have registered fever heat. The dingy four walls of their apartment rang with the haranguing, the invective, the argument and the diatribe of his fanaticism on the subject of better conditions for day laborers in the building trade.

Of course, Etta agreed with him. Her father himself was a living argument. He dragged a leg from a steel beam that had felled him while working on a scaffolding of one of the most spectacular office buildings in New York. One of his lungs was half eaten away from pneumonia contracted while working on a building whose foundation had oozed wet slime over his feet for half a winter.

Etta Rouke had plenty of reason to resent the perils, the long hours, the exposure of a trade such as her father's. But his haranguing was so relentless. Every spare hour was spent at the meeting hall, at union headquarters, at organizing camps. The neighbors in the gaunt brown tenement shied away from him. The children made blah-blah noises with their tongues when they saw him coming.

With the whole of her heart, Etta, who was thirty-five, tired and disillusioned, came to hate the very name of the Cause to which her father was devoting so much of his time, his vitality and his strength. For twenty years, while her girlhood had slipped from her and her devotion to her father had dulled her eye and broken her spirit, Etta had lived rebelliously in the narrow slum.

After all, man had always been man's oppressor. There would always be day laborers hurtling from scaffoldings and carrying down with them the entire destinies of helpless families and little children. There would always be men who would never live to see the interior of the beautiful homes they created. There would always be men forced to live in the squalor of airless tenements while others lived in the beauty of the homes their manual labor had constructed.

Rouke was tilting at windmills, and Etta who had yearned and yearned over a period of twenty years to coax him into the country where he could ply his building trade at the more placid work of carpentry, grew older and bitterer and more disillusioned as the merciless winter and the merciless summers lashed their way into the narrow aisle of Clancey street.

Earlier, when her own spirit was higher and there had been a youth who had finally tired of waiting, there had been something idealistic and noble and exciting about Rouke's loyalty to the cause of his fellow laborers. All that was gone now. Rouke was a garrulous old fanatic. He buttonholed whoever would listen to him, he prattled of capital and labor, unions and vested interests. Meanwhile, the men who had worked side by side with him on the scaffolding for a number of years had grown wealthy; had become foremen and even master builders on their own while Rouke prattled and prattled of a dim Elysium, which, while it remained very bright in his obsessed eyes, grew dimmer and dimmer in the dimming eyes of Etta.

The summers were even more terrible than the winters. The one that came in this particular August was as hot as a mask to the face. The narrow tenement street oozed smells. Babies lay naked on fire escapes. Fruit rotted and dripped on the pushcarts. The apartment which Etta shared with her father was rancid with stale air and, to top it, it was necessary because of lack of windows to keep the gas burning all day or indulge in the alternative of sitting, sweltering in the hot darkness.

Hate began to smolder in Etta. Not against the Cause that was keeping her father, fanatic that he was, in the swelter of meeting halls when he was not at his work, not against the stifling tenement, but against her father himself. Fanatic. Fool.

The old dream of a place in the country, even a one-room shanty on a river front, began to press against her blazing eyelids with a pain that was scarcely endurable. The time had come, Etta realized to herself, when it was either a matter of escaping the turgid horror of those terror-ridden days or going mad. Her father was sacrificing his life to a cause that thanked him not—sacrificing his sanity, because sometimes it seemed to Etta that the madness of frustration lay in pools in the old man's eyes, the same madness of frustration that might be said to lie in the pool of Etta's heart.

The days were unbearable. The nights were unbearable. The comings and goings of Rouke, mumbling of injustice, mumbling of workingmen's rights, mumbling of widows and children, mumbling of pensions, mumbling of organized labor, made day and night alike a nightmare.

One night Etta, in a frenzy of what might have been actual madness, caught her father by the coat lapels as he came staggering in from a meeting around midnight and screamed out, between sobs of agony and moans of pain, her inability to prolong their kind of life. For the first time, Rouke seemed to realize some of the mental agony and deprivations that had been his daughter's. The years of her dinning it at him had apparently left him unmoved and now, suddenly, looking at her frenzied eyes, hearing her tormented cries, he seemed to understand.

After he succeeded in quieting her that night, Rouke agreed to sacrifice the uppermost interest in his life—better conditions for the day laborer—and move with his daughter to the country. He admitted defeat. He admitted to the need of the change of environment for them both.

And the next day, in the midst of an impassioned and what he announced was a final plea for a pension bill for the wives of laborers who had been widowed by accident in the trade, Rouke toppled over and dropped dead.

It was as it should have been. On the rostrum of his Cause, Rouke had surrendered only to death.

Etta felt that way about it and secretly blessed the destiny that had not permitted her father to live to surrender.

Etta still occupies the tenement in Clancy street. Taking up where her father left off, she is the moving spirit in the movement to obtain better working conditions for the day laborer. Every day she lectures in some meeting hall or another and, by night, she harangues.

The neighborhood children, when they see her coming, stick out their tongues and cry, "Blah-blah."

Many Names Proposed for Thirteenth Month

If a thirteenth month is added to the calendar, as many who favor calendar reform propose, what shall its name be? As yet the thirteen-month calendar is only a subject for discussion, but already George Eastman, chairman of the American committee on calendar reform, has reecived forty-four suggestions of names for the extra month and has forwarded them to the League of Nations, which will hold an international conference on the subject.

Some propose that the new month be called Between, Middlemonth, Central, Medial or Mid-estival—names apparently chosen because, according to some plans, the additional month would be placed between June and July. And since other positions for the new month have also been proposed, such names as Primavera, Primo, Ultimo and Annular have been suggested.

Many are in favor of Sol or Helial, which are Latin for sun and a Greek derivative, respectively but others prefer Lunar, Lune, Lunes or Luno, after the Latin for moon. Some would follow the precedent already set in naming the months by giving the new one the name of one of the Roman goddesses Minerva, Venus or Ceres—and others by giving the month a number in Latin; included in these are Tretember, Sextember, Undecember, Undezember and Sextober.

Again, it has been pointed out that the new name might serve to symbolize a new spirit and to that end, Liberty, Pax and Progress have been proposed. Others favor Christ, Christus, Salvator, Vincent, Benedict and Pius.

Other names proposed thus far are: Remador, Meton, Treizer Maxime, Evember, Avent, Vacance and Woodro.—New York Times.

Hard to Explain Moods

The cause of moods lies usually too deep to be casually determined. Possibly we all keep spiritual and invisible company which lifts us up or down to its level. Else there is no easy explanation for the fact that sometimes the future looks promising, amusing and worth its price, while on other days the view is so hindered by hurdles, obstacles and holes in the road that we are tempted to give up the journey and sit down by the side of the road holding out a tin cup for whatever fate may put into it.—Exchange.

Atmosphere Part of Earth

The atmosphere is considered as an envelope of the earth and just as much a part of the earth as the rocks are. It goes with the rest of the earth through space and is essential to the life of the earth and to most of the processes in operation on the earth surface. A balloon suspended in the air, even though it is not connected with the surface of the earth, is being carried through space by the rotation of the earth and by its revolution around the sun. This, of course, is in addition to the winds or movements of the air due to other causes.

Monarch Expert Archer

Henry VIII was a great sportsman and patron of the chase, wrote W. W. Greener in "The Gun and Its Development," says the Detroit News. He was a great archer, and although generally using a long-bow, he frequently made use of the cross-bow when shooting for wagers. At the Field of the Cloth of Gold he shot his long-bow against the French cross-bow men and won their applause, putting his arrows successively in the center at twelve-score yards, whilst they with their cross-bows were unable to hit the target.

FAMOUS GLACIER IN REVERSE MOVE

Scientist Make Plans to Study Effects.

Muir glacier, the chief feeder of icebergs and ice fragments to landlocked Glacier bay, is the best known and one of the most interesting of American glaciers, says the National Geographic society. It is not a narrow river of ice of the ordinary type, but rather a broad lake of ice fed by tributary streams in many directions, and discharging through the comparatively narrow Muir inlet into Glacier bay.

Glacier bay itself is one of several fjords which gash the coast of Alaska's panhandle, not far from the point where the panhandle is joined to the main part of Alaska. It is perhaps best known to shipping men as the farthest north part of the long, island-sheltered "inland passage," up which boats can weave a way from Seattle and Vancouver.

But Glacier bay is not a through passage, and consequently its upper reaches, a solitude of ice and snow and new-born rocks, dim, dreary, mysterious, is seldom visited by cargo steamers.

From end to end Glacier bay stretches 50 miles, and is fed by half a dozen glaciers of enormous size. Muir glacier, named for its discoverer, John Muir, is the largest. Where it ends Muir glacier spreads across a front of three miles and is a thousand feet high, although some 700 feet are under water.

The bottom of this valley of discharge is below sea level, so that the ice-packed front is constantly washed by the water of the ocean. The part of the valley not occupied by the glacier itself is known as Muir inlet, a branch of Glacier bay.

Muir glacier gained most of its fame and scientific attention from the fact that it is one of the liveliest of North American glaciers. Various estimates of its speed have been given, some of them as high as 60 feet a day, although 7 to 10 feet a day is generally accepted among scientists as nearer to its true rate.

Glacier movement can be estimated most easily by driving a number of stakes in the ice and a single stake along the land near the glacier. By watching the relative positions of the two kinds of stakes, and by measuring the number of ice stakes that pass the given land point within a certain time, the speed of the glacier can be determined.

Yet, while Muir glacier, moving seaward, constantly "calves" icebergs, large and small, and a daily crop of "growlers," as small ice fragments are known, its ice front has been "running in reverse" almost constantly since Glacier bay was explored by John Muir in 1879.

In 1792, when this part of the Alaskan coast was mapped by the English navigator, Vancouver, Muir inlet and Muir glacier could not be seen from the sea. Nearly the whole of Glacier bay was then filled with ice. Since the time of Vancouver the retreat of the ice in this part of Glacier bay has been more than 15 miles.

Between 1890 and 1892 there was a slight advance, but in 1899 an earthquake helped the sea recapture a great deal of territory and another major recession, which extended across the entire front of Muir glacier, began.

Previous to 1899 Muir glacier was a favorite stopping place of Alaskan tourist steamers. Passengers were landed a short distance from the front of the glacier and usually the glacier would oblige by launching a huge block of ice which broke through the floating pack ice in front with a resounding crash.

Since the earthquake of 1899 a solid ice pack 5 to 10 miles in width has made approach to the face of the glacier itself difficult, although the number of visitors is still considerable.

Back of the ice pack the glacier has diminished steadily, while, paradoxically, its general bulk has been moving seaward. It is this "backward movement" that a recently formed scientific expedition is to observe.

Every State Now Has Some Angoras

IF YOU are accustomed to think of the angora goat as one of those queer "furrin animules" that you would have to go abroad to see in his native habitat, it may come with surprise to learn that there are more angora goats right here in the United States than in any other country in the world, and that consequently this country leads the world in its output of mohair, the fleece of the angora.

The year '49 which saw the great gold rush to California also was the occasion for the entry of nine inconspicuous immigrants, the first angora goats to be brought into this country. Evidently they found their surroundings congenial, for they flourished and multiplied and sent for a lot of their relatives to join them, until now there are fully three and a half million of these useful creatures here, clearing off the brush land, increasing grain yield, and at the same time producing a total clip of 17,000,000 pounds of mohair yearly. Every state in the Union has at least a few members of the family, but the great bulk is centered in Texas, Arizona, Oregon, New Mexico, California and Missouri.

Mohair or angora fleece must not be confused with wool. Mohair is even stronger than wool, very lustrous and, due to its structural difference, much easier than wool to keep clean. Mohair has many uses for clothing, draperies, rugs and other domestic applications but by far its most significant uses are for furniture and automobile upholstering, for which it is made up into a pile fabric called mohair velvet or sometimes velmo for short. Twelve million yards of this fabric are in use in passenger trains today, due to its extreme durability combined with pleasing appearance and fadeless dyes, while over a hundred million yards, it has been estimated, are on the highways in the form of automobile upholstery.

The skin of the angora is used for making gloves, while the meat, called chevon, is much like lamb or mutton. But, of course, by far the most important use of the angora goat is its mohair fleece which you probably rest on every time you take out your car.

U. S. LEADER IN MOHAIR INDUSTRY

STYLES may come and styles may go, in furniture as in everything else, but one kind of upholstery—mohair velvet—remains in constant popularity ever since the invention of power machinery put it within the reach of everyday folk, and not just of kings and nobles, as in previous centuries.

The demand for furniture covered with fabric made from the fleece of the angora goat has increased steadily until now the United States leads the world in angora goat raising and consequently in the production of mohair materials.

Its great durability is undoubtedly the chief reason why mohair velvet is an upholstery perennial. Not even the beauty and luster of its soft texture would suffice to win the housewife's repeated approval if mohair velvet, or velmo as it is often called, did not surpass all other materials in wearing quality. This is partly because the mohair itself is the longest wearing animal fiber known and partly because it is a pile fabric, with the wear coming on the ends of the fiber instead of along the sides. As high as 40,000 of these sturdy fibers are found to the square inch of mohair velvet.

Some knowledge of the physical structure and chemical composition of the mohair fiber is necessary to understand why it makes a superior upholstering fabric. Seen under a microscope, the mohair fiber is smooth and shiny, with fewer scales or serrations than on the wool fiber. This means that it it does not attract dirt so quickly, that dust tends to slide off the smooth hairs and that actual dirt is easily removed with a swift brushing or with soap and water if necessary, without affecting the color.

Then, too, mohair takes a fast, acid dye, so that the effects of sun and strong light need not be feared.

Like all animal fibers, mohair is normally attractive to the pestiferous house moth, but now science has perfected a means of effectually and permanently moth-proofing mohair velvet. It has been noticed that moths will actually die in preference to attacking the fabric. When one considers the tremendous amount of damage done annually by this innocent looking little insect, it is obvious that for this feature alone mohair recommends itself as the ideal fabric for fine furniture.

But though mohair velvet remains popular season after season, its colors, patterns, and weaves change with the current fashion. Beautiful solid colors, or two-tone weaves, period designs, modernistic effects or conventional patterns may all be had in mohair velvet. Sometimes the pile is cut to form the pattern, the remaining pile being stamped with a floral or other design. In other places, the pattern is formed by cutting certain of the loops and the fabric is then called frieze. If the uncut portion predominates, it is called friezette. Then again, the material may be hand-blocked in striking designs or woven on a Jacquard loom with various colored mohair yarns.

Serve Mankind in Innumerable Ways

WAY back in Old Testament times, when a day of atonement was at hand, the sins of the people were symbolically placed on the head of a goat which was then allowed to escape into the wilderness; hence the word scapegoat, or blame-bearer, which has come down through the ages.

No longer made to endure this, the goat is, however, still serving mankind in a variety of other ways, especially the angora or mohair goat as it is called from its fleece. All the time they are doing this, they are also growing a wonderful fleece of long, silky, white mohair which is clipped once or twice a year and sent to the mills for manufacturing into fabrics.

The pile material resulting, known as velmo or mohair velvet, is in great demand as upholstering for automobiles, trains, busses and airplanes as well as for fine furniture in the home, because it will wear practically forever, and is as easy to keep clean as it is beautiful to look at. It is one of the most satisfactory fibers known for dyeing. Mohair, unlike wool, can not be felted, but is permanently resilient and springy and therefore cool and comfortable as a seat fabric.

U. S. LEADER IN MOHAIR INDUSTRY

First Goats Brought Here in '49; 17 Million Pounds Clipped Yearly.

STYLES may come and styles may go, in furniture as in everything else, but one kind of upholstery—mohair velvet—remains in constant popularity ever since the invention of power machinery put it within the reach of everyday folk, and not just of kings and nobles, as in previous centuries.

The demand for furniture covered with fabric made from the fleece of the angora goat has increased steadily until now the United States leads the world in angora goat raising and consequently in the production of mohair materials.

Its great durability is undoubtedly the chief reason why mohair velvet is an upholstery perennial. Not even the beauty and luster of its soft texture would suffice to win the housewife's repeated approval if mohair velvet, or velmo as it is often called, did not surpass all other materials in wearing quality. This is partly because the mohair itself is the longest wearing animal fiber known and partly because it is a pile fabric, with the wear coming on the ends of the fiber instead of along the sides. As high as 40,000 of these sturdy fibers are found to the square inch of mohair velvet.

Some knowledge of the physical structure and chemical composition of the mohair fiber is necessary to understand why it makes a superior upholstering fabric. Seen under a microscope, the mohair fiber is smooth and shiny, with fewer scales or serrations than on the wool fiber. This means that it does not attract dirt so quickly, that dust tends to slide off the smooth hairs and that actual dirt is easily removed with a swift brushing or with soap and water if necessary, without affecting the color.

Then, too, mohair takes a fast, acid dye, so that the effects of sun and strong light need not be feared.

Like all animal fibers, mohair is naturally attractive to the pestiferous house moth, but new science has perfected a means of chemically and permanently mothproofing mohair velvet. It has been noticed that moths will actually die in preference to attacking the fabric. When one considers the tremendous amount of damage done annually by this innocent looking little insect, it is obvious that for this feature alone mohair recommends itself as the ideal fabric for fine furniture.

But though mohair velvet remains popular season after season, its colors, patterns, and weaves change with the current fashion. Beautiful solid colors, or two-tone weaves, period designs, modernistic effects or conventional patterns may all be had in mohair velvet. Sometimes the pile is cut to form the pattern, the remaining pile being stamped with a floral or other design. In other places, the pattern is formed by cutting certain of the loops and the fabric is then called frieze. If the uncut portion predominates, it is called friezette. Then again, the material may be hand-blocked in striking designs or woven on a jacquard loom with various colored mohair yarns.

Serve Mankind in Innumerable Ways

'WAY back in Old Testament times, when a day of atonement was at hand, the sins of the people were symbolically placed on the head of a goat which was then allowed to escape into the wilderness; hence the word scapegoat, or blame-bearer, which has come down through the ages.

No longer made to endure this, the goat is, however, still serving mankind in a variety of other ways, especially the angora or mohair goat as it is called from its fleece. All the time they are doing this, they are also growing a wonderful fleece of long, silky, white mohair which is clipped once or twice a year and sent to the mills for manufacturing into fabrics.

The pile material resulting, known as velmo or mohair velvet, is in great demand as upholstering for automobiles, trains, buses and airplanes as well as for fine furniture in the home, because it will wear practically forever, and is as easy to keep clean as it is beautiful to look at. It is one of the most satisfactory fibers known for dyeing. Mohair, unlike wool, can not be felted, but is permanently resilient and springy and therefore cool and comfortable as a seat fabric.

4-H Club To Give Achievement Day Program Oct. 9

Mr. Harrison and Mr. Pflughoeft to be Speakers of the Day

4-H Club workers representing the local club are now engaged in the preparation for their annual fall achievement day program, the date for the event having been set for Friday afternoon, Oct. 9th, according to an announcement made by leaders of the local club.

The exhibits this year will be somewhat larger than usual, as there are more members enrolled than in the past years, and those who have taken part have put forth special efforts to have the exhibits in first class condition.

The local club, which we can say is one of the peppiest in the community, has held a steady line of meetings all summer, and as a result made a very fine showing with their work.

The Holt Commercial Club will donate first prizes to the owners of the best dairy and beef calves and second prizes to the owners of the second best. There will also be a prize for showmanship, cooking, and sewing.

A free lunch will be served to the members of the club and the club leaders and judges.

Mr. Harrison of Warren, in company with Mr. H. A. Pflughoeft of Crookston, will be here to give the main addresses and rank the exhibits.

The program will commence at 2.30 p. m. and will be held on Main Street, where the judging will also be done.

The members of the club will give several numbers on the program. Following is the program as scheduled for the afternoon:

Parade—Sunnyside Harmonica Band in lead
Song—Holt Quartette
Address of Welcome — Geo. Fricker
Music—Dutch Band
Debate—by Club Members
Speech—by Miss Doris Leiran
Remarks—by John Augustine and John Benitt, Club Leaders
Song—Holt Quartette
Talks—by H. F. Harrison and H. A. Pflughoeft
Judging and Showmanship
Prize Awarding

The prizes will consist of leather halters and lead strap for the first prizes and lead strap and chain for the second prizes. Something useful in their line will be given the winners in the cooking and sewing projects.

We are proud to have such an active group as the local club has proven itself to be, and we ask all who possibly can, to turn out Friday afternoon and take in the program, and see the exhibits and the judging of the 4-H Club projects.

Stop, Look, and Listen!

Numerous accidents have occured this summer in collisions between vehicles on the highways and vehicles entering the highways from private roads.

Since the new highway here passes straight thru the village it may be a good idea for all in general to stop before they enter the highway and, thereby avoid a smash-up. The law reads that way, so why not live up to it and stay alive.

Forest Fires

The terrible and destructive fires in the forest and peat bog areas in this part of the state recently should have focused the public attention on the problem.

Thousands of acres of valuable timber have been devastated, families have been left homeless, human and animal lives have been needlessly destroyed. Just a little prevention ahead of time could have saved the whole area from becoming a charred ruin.

Much of the loss is laid to the cheap fellow who would go out burn without a permit, thereby putting the whole forest area in danger-such is arson-certainly one of the most despicable of all crimes. This we must deal with as best we can through processes of law, and through stricter and more adequate legislation for punishing the offender. But that part of the loss which has resulted from carelessness can only be solved, for our future safety, by the individual. The worker in the woods--the vacationist--the maker of campfires--the smoker-- each has been responsible, through indifference, carelessness, or ignorance, for millions of dollars in damage.

We hear much talk of forest conservation -- yet the work of years may be ruined overnight by a single untended campfire, a dropped cigar butt.
This year the forest fire problem has been especially serious, and it is to be earnestly hoped that out of the unnecessary destruction will come one gain in a new sense of responsibility on the part of the public that will outlaw forest fires in the years to come. Keep the forest green.

Munch Reinstated

Lovers of the Outdoors and especially friends of William F. Munch, of Crookston, will be greatly pleased to know that he again entered the employ of the Game and Fish Department the first part of last week.

His experience of 26 years with the enforcement of game and fish laws in the ten of the northwestern counties of the state will bring to the department a valuable compilation of data and acquaitanceship which will mean much to future sportsmen.

The state has a large project under way in the Thief Lake reclamation project and as Mr. Munch has been familiar with every detail of this, he was this week appointed superintendent of the Thief Lake state public shooting grounds and game refuge in eastern Marshall county, Louis Enstrom, deputy director of game and fish announced this week.

After being released by the department recently, Warden Munch was reinstated by W. D. Stewart, director of the department, upon petition of residents in this district. In addition to serving as superintendent he will also be a state warden.

Governor Olson again showed his fine judgement in having the veteran reappointed and all his friends feel deeply grateful.

Death of Mrs. Sagstuen

Funeral services were conducted here on Monday afternoon from the Free Mission church, for Mrs. Andrew L. Sagstuen, pioneer of this community, who passed away at her home Thursday evening after an illness of several weeks' duration. Rev. Thv. Myhrer of Newfolden and Rev. O. J. Haukeness of Holt officiated. Interment was made in the Holt cemetery. Obituary will be published next week.

Band Practice

There will be band practice every Tuesday evening in the Holt school house, until further notice.

Let us all attend the next practice night, as a business meeting will be held.

Rev. O. J. Haukeness and family who have been renting the Ole Ellingson house furnished since they came here have this week moved into the Clarence Erickson home vacated by the Lorentson family.

They have equipped their new home with all new furniture which Rev. Haukeness bought in Minneapolis recently.

Geo. Curtis and a crew of several men from Gatzke are this week busy with the work of getting the old livery barn up off of the foundation for moving.

Oscar T. Johnson who this spring bought a hundred and thirty farm on the east side of the village limits from Guy Anderson, has purchased the big barn from Hjalmer Peterson and is having it moved out there for a dairy barn.

Mud Lake Rambles

Gerald Moberg, who has been employed at Humboldt through harvest to fall plowing, came home last Tuesday. He left immediately for the John Moberg farm at Gatzke where he will be employed for some time.

Alfred and Gerald Moberg of Gatzke were callers at the H. Moberg home Tuesday evening.

A number of friends and relatives gathered at the K. Nelson home and helped Ludvig Monson and Andy Olson celebrate their birthdays.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Sagstuen and Mrs. Knute Nelson were callers in Thief River Falls on Saturday.

Doris and Eunice Leiran spent Sunday with home folks. They returned to their duties in Thief River Falls Sunday evening.

Gladys and Beulah Dahl also visited with home folks Sunday.

Lydia Moberg, who has been employed at the J. P. Benitt home the past few weeks returned to her home in Mud Lake on Sunday.

RendahlSannes was a business caller in Thief River Falls Tuesday morning.

Mr. and Mrs. Victor Folda and son and Delmar Hagen of Montana are visiting friends and relatives near Gatzke. Mrs. Folda is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dick Hagen of Gatzke.

Mr. E. A. Mostue, teacher of Dist. 152, visited Sunday with home folks in Thief River Falls.

Julius Brekke of Nielsville called at the Elmer Odie home Sunday evening. Mr. Brekke is Mrs. Odie's brother.

Carl Ostby of McIntosh visited at the Olaf Dahl home Sunday.

Olaus Rodahl returned to his work at Caledonia, No. Dakota after a visit with his family on their homestead in East Valley township.

Rev. M. B. Ordahl went down to Crookston to attend the spe- conference of the Wild Rice district of the Synod church.

A Ladies Aid Society was organized at Mud Lake at a meeting held at the O. B. Johnson home. There were seven members enrolled and the officers were: Mrs. J. H. Knutson, president; Mrs. A. C. Jahr, vice-president; Mrs. M. B. Ordahl, secretary, and Mrs. Karen Knutson, treasurer.

John Engstrom and wife, Gunder Sorter and wife, Mrs. Sigurd Rice spent one day picking cranberries in the tamarac swamps north of Mud Lake. They reported finding a lot of berries.

Mr. and Mrs. B. L. Backe, Miss Martha Mortenson and P. L. Anderson formed a party and drove to Thief River Falls to attend the theatre.

Ole Reierson raised a swell crop of Early Rose potatoes. Eight of the spuds which he had brought in to display at the newspaper office weighed 15½ pounds, and the king of the patch weighed 2½ pounds alone.

Holt was getting all set to put on a big market day, and some of the local business places were using quarter page ads to tell the public about the specials offered for the occasion.

Co. 4-H Club Achievement Day

The county 4-H Club achievement day will be held at Warren on Saturday, October 10, with winning entries in various projects will be entered in competition in the final show event of the season's work.

The event at Warren will be of great interest to all the clubs in the county, as twelve free trips to the Junior Livestock Show at South St. Paul will be awarded to outstanding workers.

The Fauvers Move In

Claude Fauver and family of Spring Valley, Minn., arrived here recently with their household goods and farm equipment to make their home on the Andrew Bjerk farm, which they have rented.

The Fragudt Bros., who worked this farm the past year will move onto the old Iver Engebretson forty.

The Carlson Mercantile Co., owners of fine stores in this part of the state, opened the apple season here by shipping in a whole carload of Washington Jonathan apples. The car arrived on track here Monday and the apples were distributed to their five stores during the forepart of the week. According to reports from their store managers the apples are selling at a fast clip.

A CANDLE IN THE WILDERNESS

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

by IRVING BACHELLER

Meanwhile the governor himself sat smoking a long Turkish pipe wrought of amber and jasmine wood. He smiled and looked at the strangers but said nothing. His feet could never bask in the sunlight of his smiles, being shadowed by his own periphery. He was as silent as a beer barrel whose structure his mid-section resembled.

The jolly burgomaster bade the negro, who had opened the door, take the newcomers to their room with their luggage. Robert put on a new tan coat, hose, shoes and doublet which he had bought at Fort Orange.

"They'll have to take me as I am in this suit of new buckskin which I put on at the fort," Amos remarked. "It's as good as new."

Coming below they found the house lighted for the great fete of Twelfth Night. Mr. Van Twiller and the dominie sat at a table drinking together.

"Sit down with us and drink to all the wise men," said the dominie as he ordered beer to be brought for them. "The women are busy baking the great cake. It will look like a snow-covered mountain. Here's hoping that one of you may be the Bean king."

Numbers of Englishmen from Virginia and from the colonies in New England—dissatisfied with the outlook or the courts—had come to New Amsterdam. More than a score of these malcontents were now at the fete. Suddenly in a group of noisy merrymakers Robert discovered Roderick Leighton—the friend of James Rosewell—whom he had seen as a guest at the governor's house in Boston. A fear came to Robert, for he knew that the friends would probably have met in New Amsterdam when Rosewell came down from the north. Leighton was overcupped. With three hundred merrymakers in the big house there was little danger of a recognition. Robert and Amos made their way to another room and sat down in a shadowed corner with some happy Dutchmen who were smoking and drinking beer at a round table. Near them a little group of Englishmen were telling drolls and gossiping. They said that there were not five people in New Amsterdam outside the Company's office who could read or write and that the governor himself signed with a cross.

It would seem that Fate had its own plans for the boy Robert. Suddenly a singular event thrust him into unwelcome prominence. The great Twelfth Night cake was a kind of treasure mountain. A gilded bean had been dropped into its batter before the baking. He who found it in his portion was the Bean king—the Balthasar of the fete—to whom all present had to render homage. Robert Heathers drew the bean. Immediately he became the center of interest. The crowd gathered around him. The burgomaster led him to the big room and introduced him in a humorous speech. The young man accepted this in excellent good humor. He summoned Amos, who translated each sentence after it was spoken.

"Greatness was always beyond my hope," Robert answered. "Like most greatness it comes to me by accident. It's an ill fit. I feel as I did once years ago when I put on my father's breeches. My throne is founded on a bean but no king could have a fairer kingdom—lovelier ladies and more gallant gentlemen to yield him homage as undeserved as that of the king of my native land. I only wish it were my prerogative to kiss all my female subjects, but I am happy, nevertheless, in looking at them."

He was a popular king. All the ladies came and congratulated him and made deep curtsies as they shook his hand, and some offered him their cheeks to be kissed. Then they brought him food and drink and souvenirs.

Amos hugged the boy when they went to their room.

"I am proud o' ye!" he exclaimed. "When somethin' has to be said ye know what to say as well as Capt. John Smith ever did."

"Well, for a long time I've had nothing to do but think. I'm different. I reckon thinking has been good for me. Now I'm a man—not of much account—but a kind of man. We have faced so many perils that a Twelfth Night fete ought not to worry us."

But he did worry when he had got into bed. A suspicion loomed out of the mysterious depths of his inner self that the bean would grow into a tree with death in its shadow. He would not dispel the happiness of his friend with his own fears. He bore them alone. If he had been less considerate one may be almost sure that the history of his life would have been very different, for the shrewd old pioneer with his clear vision would have been up and doing instead of lying down for needed sleep.

The celebration of Twelfth Night continued twenty-four hours with a diminishing and diverted fervor, some time being needed for recovery.

Robert and Amos were among the crowd that gathered on the plain at ten o'clock to witness the lively, merry pastime of "clubbing the cat." A lightly coopered barrel with a cat in it was roped upright between posts. The contestants stood about a hundred feet away and threw clubs at the barrel. The one who broke it and released the cat got a bottle of good wine. The barrel was no sooner broken than all the throwers set out in a rush for the scared cat, who got away from that place with no unnecessary delay. If one succeeded in catching the cat one was rewarded with a bottle of wine.

The noisier game of "Pulling the Goose" followed. A goose whose neck and head had been thoroughly greased was hung by its feet to a cord stretched between posts about ten feet high. Men rode under the goose at a gallop and by seizing its head endeavored to pull it free—a most difficult undertaking. The slippery goose was himself the reward of the successful contestant.

At midday Robert and Amos returned to the house of the director general to find that its atmosphere had changed. Their host met them with a sober face in the hall. He was polite but eager to get rid of them. He had learned that the Hector, an English ship, was anchored in a harbor off the Connecticut shore near a small settlement called Quinnepiac. It would be sailing within a week or so. Many traders on the Long Island were taking their furs to that ship, as there might be a moon's wait or more before a Dutch vessel would arrive. At a point beyond the Hellegat river they could cross in a shallop to an English trading post on the East bay. There they could soon find conveyance to the ship. He would give them horses and a guide to take them northward to the shallop ferry.

Irwin Myers

Rosewell's Handsome Face Was Red With Indignation.

The matter was not open to argument. They went that afternoon.

They found a small settlement of English people a mile or so from the landing.

There they learned that the Hector was iced in and would not be sailing before the moon of the bright lights late in March or early in April. They were made welcome by a man who lived in a comfortable cabin and who spent his winters hunting and trapping and clearing his land. A small farm kept him busy in the summer. That evening Amos said to Robert: "I didn't like Mr. Van Twiller's change o' front. Can ye explain it?"

"It's an easy riddle," said Robert. "Roderick Leighton fell in with Jim Rosewell and Jim told him that I was trying to escape the hangman's noose waiting for me in Boston. Of course, he couldn't help seeing me last night. He has told the director general that I'm an outlaw and a fugitive. The poor man was anxious to wash his hands of me before the news spread."

"I see through that barn door," Amos answered. "I wish ye had told me this afore now. It's that hang-by cullion Rosewell just because he wants to kill ye out o' his way as a rival. Don't let it plague ye. We'll fix the flint o' this worricarl."

They spent seven weeks in this little settlement on the Long island, helping their host with his clearing and burning near the cabin. In the first thaw of the spring they went in a pinnace loaded with furs to Quinnepiac.

They reached the ship's side only to learn from her Puritan captain that he could take no more passengers. At the little settlement on the shore they ran upon John Samp—the Boston constable, who immediately seized Robert and disarmed him.

"I began to see it as soon as you told me," said Amos. "We've stepped into a trap. Rosewell got it all set and ready before he left the island."

The constable showed his warrant.

"Well, I'm glad to see you," said Robert. "You need look for no resistance. I'm tired of this matter and am ready to see the end of it, whatever it may be."

His friend put in a word here: "And before it ends Amos Todkill will have something to say. Hang on to yer courage."

The ample Samp with a look of wise severity thus admonished his prisoner: "Make a clean breast and throw yerself on the mercy o' the court. It will be better for ye. If ye don't I wouldn't give a cat's whiskers fer yer life."

"Do ye think that ye can scare this boy, ye old nincompoop!" Amos answered. "He'll throw himself nowhere. He'll just stand still and keep still and let 'em prove it if they can."

The last entries in the diaries of Robert and Amos were written while they waited in the rude house of a settler as the constable was storing his pack with food for the journey. It is likely that they followed the Pequot path, but the historian has no knowledge of their adventures on the way.

CHAPTER XIII

Peggy Weld Takes Charge of the Case of Robert Heathers

Peggy had bought a bit of wild country that pleased her. She had built a house on it. She and her brother—an amiable youth much devoted to his sister and two years younger than she—would be moving into it soon, with a number of servants.

When Rosewell, having returned from his quest, came to see her at the house of Ex-Governor Winthrop he gave her a dark account of Robert's look and behavior.

"He is a scapegrace—a roynish clown," Rosewell said. "We have evidence to hang him. He will try to get across the sea, but I think that the righteous arm of the law may prevent it and bring him to the punishment he deserves."

The keen-minded Peggy answered: "If anything pulls him here it will not be the righteous arm of the law, it will be the jealous arm of James Rosewell."

"Will you never come to your right mind in this matter?" he asked. "I am trying to save you from disgrace. Have you no thought of your soul?"

"Yes, but it is not like a sore finger. It gives me time to think of others. You have a kind of inflammation of the soul. You mistake it for righteousness, but where is your charity?"

"I have no charity for proved adulterers."

"Yet you are very human and I have a fancy that you could slip and fall as easily as any man I know. You ought not to be judging other men so freely. I have no faith in your evidence."

Rosewell was irritated. He arose and said: "Peggy, I think that I shall be able to show you that I do not misjudge the man or the evidence. He asked me to give you this love token which you sent to him the night of his escape. You were then engaged to me."

He put the medallion in her hands.

"True, but I had learned that I could not love a man worshiping a God of iron related to the Tudors and the Stuarts. I frankly confess to you that I had begun to love Robert Heathers."

Rosewell's handsome face was red with indignation. He behaved with admirable restraint. His British temper could not accept defeat.

"Well, Peggy, I love you in spite of all this," he said. "What I have done has been for your sake. You will know soon that this man is not worthy of your love. Then, if you will let me, I shall try to show you that I am not so stern as you think me."

With that he left her. The drama began to quicken its pace. While this talk was going on, William, sitting by the fireside with Margaret Hooper, who had mothered him through his troubles, was unconsciously weaving threads for the curious pattern of the last act. The woman told him of events which had come to pass aforetime in England. She told how her grandfather, John Hooper, the bishop of Worcester, had been burned at the stake by Mary Tudor, how her mother and uncle had fled from home and hidden in the greenwood, how at last they had been captured by the horsemen of the bloody queen and driven before them in a storm, like cattle, and shut up in dungeons all because they had been identified as members of a conventicle. These recitals came in a melancholy, monotonous tone as she sat knitting by the fireside.

Good Cheer

Good cheer is almost as essential to life as sunshine, air and water—and is quite as plentiful.

Cheerfulness has a dual value in life. First it helps you—then it helps you to help others—and it keeps on spreading out into the great throng of humanity, stirring the hearts of men as the gentle breeze stirs the leaves of the forest—returning again and again to you in its endless course and all the while making the heavy load lighter and the dark road brighter for all.

Good cheer is one of the biggest little things among all the elements of success.

Corn That Resists Attack of Frosts

Experiments Prove Rich Soil Increases the Vitality of the Plant.

Just as a well-fed man is better able to withstand the rigors of cold weather, so corn which has received an abundance of plant food is better able than poorly nourished corn to withstand frost attacks, both in the late spring and early fall, agronomists of the United States Department of Agriculture have found.

Department plant breeders studied the question at Bloomington, Ill., in the corn belt during the last three years. They produced frost with a portable refrigeration plant which was used in different parts of the corn plots.

The results of the experiments suggest that farmers may minimize or avoid frost danger to their corn by growing it in fields that have been fertilized or are naturally rich in plant food.

Corn was planted in 1930 on land plowed from virgin sod in the fall of 1929 and also on soil which had been plowed from virgin sod in 1921 and cropped continuously since. Corn grown on the "new" ground was much more resistant to the frost than that grown on the older land.

While testing corn on cropped and on new soil, the agronomists also experimented with fertilizer in varying amounts on the old soil. Plants growing in fertilized soil showed more resistance to frost than those growing in untreated soil. Young plants of a cold-susceptible strain in untreated soil were killed in a few minutes at a temperature of 33 degrees to 34 degrees F. whereas plants of the same strain gorwn in a fertilized hill showed no ill effect from four hours of exposure to a 30 degree temperature.

Fall tests gave much the same results. In one instance, approximately 50 plants were subjected to a temperature of 26 degrees to 27 degrees for two hours. Half of them were on fair soil and the remainder on soil capable of producing 15 bushels more to the acre. The test was made about the middle of September when the kernels were about four-fifths matured. Following exposure to the cold, neither set of plants showed any noticeable injury. When the crop was ripe, however, the corn on the poorer soil had failed to mature completely, while that on the richer soil had matured naturally and fully.

Good Season to Market Farm Grain on the Hoof

This is a season when farmers may well plan to market as much as possible of their grain and hay on the hoof. Current market prices are not such as to encourage the sale of wheat and small grains.

The man who wishes to get the most out of grain as feed will find it profitable to grind it. Grinding increases the digestibility. It has been said by experienced men that a feed grinder should pay for itself the first year, through the extra profits obtained because of grinding the feed. However that may be, this is a year when we do think farmers should feed their low-priced grains and prepare them for feeding so as to get their greatest nutritive value.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.

Sun for the Pig's House

The pig's house should be built so as to permit the greatest benefit from the sun's rays at farrowing time. This means that the angle of the roof containing glass to permit admission of sunlight would be different for February farrowing from that at the April farrowing. In planning a new hog house, therefore, consideration should be given the appropriate farrowing date of spring litters.

A permanent hog house should not be used unless it contains a floor that can be thoroughly cleaned before farrowing time. Pigs farrowed on worm-infested earth floors are seldom profitable. Concrete floors are seldom profitable. Concrete floors are satisfa tory, if properly constructed. Unless arrangements can be made for sanitation in a permanent house, the portable type of house is preferable. It can be moved to clean ground each year.

Less Barn Feeding

At the pasture day at the Massachusetts Agricultural college, Clarence Parsons, superintendent of the college farm, stated that whereas the usual practice at the college had been to feed about one pound of grain to each three pounds of milk, he has this year reduced grain feeding to 125 pounds of 12 per cent protein grain for a total production of 900 pounds of milk without any apparent shrinkage in either producton or flesh. The station has under way several feeding tests in connection with intensive pasture.

They Liked Wheat

Illinois farmers fed wheat last year with splendid results, according to E. T. Robbins, University of Illinois. Of 36 men who kept feeding records on their hogs for Robbins, 23 reported good success, equal to corn and seven said it was as good or better than corn. Feeders can afford to pay the same price for wheat that they would have to pay for corn as the wheat is worth enough more to pay for grinding or cracking, Robbins believes.—Prairie Farmer.

May the Best Month for Alfalfa Sowing

Prepare Ground in Fall, but Wait, Says Expert.

It is all right to get ready to sow alfalfa in the fall, but delay the actual sowing until next May, advises John H. Barron of the New York state college of agriculture. Work the land well this fall and repeat the cultivating next spring and then sow without a nurse crop, he says.

Mr. Barron cites the success of the Lovejoy farm located near Pittsford in Monroe county, New York. Here the land was in cabbage in 1930, the crop was kept clean and alfalfa was seeded alone in May, 1931. By June 25 the seeding had made an excellent weed-free stand. The cutting of hay taken this summer is worth more than a grain nurse crop would have been. And in addition, says Mr. Barron, when the alfalfa crop is in its prime the yield will be larger than if it had been planted with a nurse crop.

By seeding alone in spring the winter killing during the first winter is largely avoided and much of the competition from weeds is avoided by the fall and spring cultivation before seeding, he says.

Quack Grass Worm Not Benefactor, but a Pest

Hailed as real benefactors in St. Louis county, because they appeared to feed almost exclusively on quack grass, some worms sent to A. G. Ruggles, state entomologist and professor of entomology, Minnesota university farm, have been identified as wheat stem maggots. While they might aid some in combating quack grass, these worms are decidedly a mixed blessing in grain areas, Mr. Ruggles explained, because of their tendency to infest crops such as wheat and barley, causing the heads to turn white without filling. Considerable damage was reported from these insects in East Polk county this year.

Several weeks ago, August Neubauer, the St. Louis county agent, reported the presence of worms which fed on quack grass and which it appeared might prove effective in combating this weed if enough of them were present.

However, upon being identified by Mr. Ruggles from specimens furnished by Mr. Neubauer, "the worm turned" as it were, proving to be an old pest, rather than a new friend.

Chopped Alfalfa for Pigs

Pork produced by feeding chopped alfalfa hay as a supplement reached a good marketable weight fully 17 days before the other pigs and was produced at a saving of 41 cents for each 100 pounds, according to a recent report by the South Dakota experiment station. Twenty-five pounds of chopped alfalfa hay was used in a mixture with 50 pounds of tankage and 25 pounds of l'nseed oil meal as a supplement to yellow corn. There was a saving of 16 pounds of feed for each 100 pounds of gain due to the alfalfa.

Since chopping or grinding alfalfa is resorted to where hay is artificially cured for feeding to dairy cattle, many feel that it should be even more worth while to adopt this practice for all classes of stock where natural curing makes it impossible to secure so high-grade a product.

Wheat in the Ration

The value of wheat in a live stock fattening ration and pointers to remember in feeding wheat as determined from the experience of successful feeders and tests conducted by experiment stations are summarized by the Colorado Agricultural college as follows:

For hogs wheat varies in feeding value from equality with corn, pound for pound, to 8 per cent greater efficiency than corn. For cattle and lambs wheat alone shows 90 to 100 per cent of the value of corn pound for pound. When fed half and half with corn wheat appears to be equal to corn for cattle and lambs.

Wheat should be coarsely ground for cattle and hogs. Grinding appears to be unnecessary for lambs.

Around the Farm

Planting orchards on hillsides rather than in valleys is advocated by a meteorologist of the fruit-frost service.

* * *

Fifteen carloads of potatoes were grown on 70 acres this year by W. J. Sapp, De Funiak Springs, Fla.

* * *

John Simons, who lives eight miles west of Wichita, Kan., harvested 70 bushels of wheat this year from 1.6 acres that had been in a feedlot.

* * *

When sheep and lambs are to be treated for stomach worms they should not be given any food or water for at least 12 hours before treatment. The remedy commonly used is bluestone or copper sulphate.

* * *

Cultivate next year's alfalfa field in fall and spring to kill weeds and then sow the alfalfa next May.

* * *

Fruit ttat is packed well will go through to market in better condition and will sell quicker for a higher price, say Penn State horticulturists.

* * *

Boll weevils are appearing in large numbers in Halifax county (Minn.) cotton fields. Some growers have begun the fight by mopping and dusting. Others say they cannot afford to poison.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water every morning before breakfast—an 85 cent bottle lasts 4 weeks—you can get Kruschen at any drug store in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back.

WOMEN: watch your BOWELS

What should women do to keep their bowels moving freely? A doctor should know the answer. That is why pure Syrup Pepsin is so good for women. It just suits their delicate organism. It is the prescription of an old family doctor who has treated thousands of women patients, and who made a special study of bowel troubles.

It is fine for children, too. They love its taste. Let them have it every time their tongues are coated or their skin is sallow. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is made from fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other harmless ingredients.

When you've a sick headache, can't eat, are bilious or sluggish; and at the times when you are most apt to be constipated, take a little of this famous prescription (all drug stores keep it ready in big bottles), and you'll know why Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the favorite laxative of over a million women!

Chance Happening

Luck is generally described as something that happens seemingly by chance. It may be an event, either good or evil, which affects the interest or happenings of an individual, but this happening is entirely casual. Luck, however, carries the idea of good luck only.

Tallest Known Man

There have been reports among the less civilized tribes and among certain savage peoples that men have measured as much as 15 feet. From actual records that have been compiled, the greatest height found was that of Topinard's Finlander, who measured 112 inches—9 feet 4 inches.

Famous English Forest

By its association with Robin Hood, the most romantic forest in England is, perhaps, Sherwood. On its verge is a curious amphitheater called Robin Hood's hill, and in the forest may still be seen a very old hollow oak tree called Robin Hood's larder. One of the ancient oaks, entirely hollow, called the Major oak, can shelter in its hollow trunk a dozen or fourteen people at once.

Old French Institution

The Academie des Jeux Floreaux is at Toulouse, France. The first floral games were held at Toulouse in May, 1324, at the summons of a guild of troubadours, who invited the lords and their friends to assemble in the garden of "Gay Science" and recite their works. In 1694 the Academie des Jeux Floreaux was constituted an academy by letters patent. At present it is especially interested in Provencal poetry.

Circumventing Colic

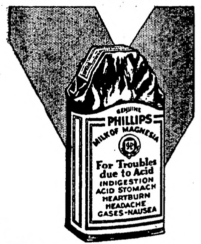
A pretty little party from Pittsburgh, who always wears a straight flush and who can't understand the ways of a man with a maid, brings her problem to Oral Hygiene. "My boy friend," she boasts, "is as fine as they come, but whenever he calls he invariably waits 15 minutes before kissing me. Now, what's his system, please?" "Perhaps," grins the editor, "he has learned how long it takes the paint to dry?"—Pathfinder Magazine.

Drum Signaling

The Smithsonian Institution says: "In the eastern Belgian Kongo tribes, particularly the Batela, have evolved a system of telegraphy through use of a wooden drum, the system of signals approaching that of a code. The drum vibrations are not articulated as in human speech; rather the message is recognized through intensity of volume, rhythm, kind of drum used, time of day, etc. In a jungle environment much information may thus be signaled."

"Knight of the Road"

Claude Duval, famous highwayman, was born in Normandy in 1643. He was sent to Paris in 1657, where he remained until he went to England in attendance on the duke of Richmond at the Restoration. He soon took to the road and became famous for his daring and gallantry. He was captured in 1670 in London and within a week was executed at Tyburn. His body was laid in state in a tavern and was viewed by huge crowds before the exhibition was stopped by a judge's order.



ACID STOMACH

EXCESS acid is the common cause of indigestion. It results in pain and sourness about two hours after eating. The quick corrective is an alkali which neutralizes acid. The best corrective is Phillips Milk of Magnesia. It has remained standard with physicians in the 50 years since its invention.

One spoonful of Phillips Milk of Magnesia neutralizes instantly many times its volume in acid. Harmless, and tasteless, and yet its action is quick. You will never rely on crude methods, once you learn how quickly this method acts.

Be sure to get the genuine.

DEVICES TO LURE THE FINNY TRIBE

Ingenious Patents Recorded at Washington.

Many early vagaries of fishermen are recorded in the United States patent office. In 1852 a patent was issued on a fly with an air-tight chamber and an aperture. Thus the fly would float, if desired, or the aperture could be opened and the fly filled with water when sub-surface fishing was desired. Variations in color of baits and feathers were suggested, "adapting them to the season of the year and to the description of fish."

The earliest rod patent of record is "after the usual manner of walking rods," with the butt-joint telescoping the other joints, and having in the handle small compartments to contain "the various implements of fishing tackle."

The same inventor also patented in the year 1852 a float containing a spring which, released by the slightest touch, would hook the fish.

In 1854 was patented a hollow sinker into which shot could be poured when the rapidity of the current or tide required a heavier sinker. Another "fishing-lead" patented in 1856 has a swivel to prevent line twisting and a hard metal base to protect the lead when striking bottom.

In 1873 an "improvement in angling-flies" was patented in that the hook was concealed in the wings of the fly, making it "more deceptive and consequently more serviceable."

The invention which still provokes a laugh among patent office officials, says a Washington patent attorney, is the lure which contained a mirror and which the inventor thus explained:

"The mirror is an additional feature that insures the effectiveness of the bait in the following manner: A male fish seeing his image, upon looking therein, will appear to see another fish approach it from the opposite side with the intent to seize the bait, and this will not only arouse his warlike spirit, but also appeal to his greed, and he will seize the bait quickly in order to defeat the approaching rival. In case the fish is suspected of cowardice, I may make the mirror of convex form in order that the rival or antagonist may appear to be smaller. In the case of a female fish the attractiveness of a mirror is too well known to need discussion. Thus the bait appeals to the ruling passion of both sexes, and renders it very certain and efficient in operation."

Boston Man Emphatic in Defense of Indians

Based on years of life in the Far West among the Indians and cowboys, Cyrus Dallin, a Boston sculptor, who has made a reputation for his Indian studies, recently delivered an address in which he scored the cowboys' and entered a plea of defense for the Indian. According to the speaker, the Indian has never been treated fairly by the whites of this country. If they had been, he says, there would never have been the conflicts which have taken place and which are blots on the white race.

Mr. Dallin described early buffalo game laws, the mail delivery system among wagon trains and many other incidents of interest about the early pioneer days. He cited the killing off of the buffaloes as the greatest blow to the Indian, for "with the death of every buffalo was sealed the death of the Indian," and he said the red man was not a "bloodthirsty savage," but "a gentleman with dignity and majesty of bearing who practiced self-restraint."

Taking a Photograph of Noise

Taking photographs of noises inside an automobile. Dr. William Braid White with apparatus which converts sound waves into photos revealing the character of the noises inside the car. Research indicates that mohair velvet or velmo is especially effective in absorbing high-pitched noises, the ones most disturbing to the human ear.

MOHAIR FABRICS USED BY SCIENCE TO TRAP NOISE

While the high cost of living is decreasing in many localities, the high cost of noise is mounting and the public is becoming more and more aware of its serious effects.

Useless noise generally means mechanical inefficiency, it vexes the nerves, lowers the efficiency of workers and promotes fatigue. Several cities have already finished or are planning noise-abatement compaigns to create quieter streets, offices, homes, railroad and motor car interiors.

Noise cannot be completely eliminated but there are many effective ways of reducing it. One of these is by the use of mohair velvet or velmo upholstery in automobiles, in trains, in offices and dwellings. Velmo is a thick, soft material with thousands of minute spaces between its tiny fibers, the hairs of the Angora goat. These spaces help trap the sound waves that otherwise would bound back and contribute to the unpleasant sounds in rooms. This is one of the main reasons why velmo is so widely used in theaters.

Chairs upholstered in this material curb the echoes from the talking screen and thereby reduce a source of annoyance that is frequently a serious problem in theaters with seats covered in a hard, sound-reflecting material.

Interesting and convincing tests to prove how valuable mohair velvet is in curbing noise, were conducted recently by Dr. William Braid White, nationally known authority on acoustics in co-operation with the Mohair Institute of Chicago.

Doctor White has a remarkable instrument which permits him to take an actual photograph of a noise! No one has ever seen a noise but Doctor White's photographs reveal interesting facts about unpleasant sounds and are being widely used to create quieter conditions.

One of Doctor White's tests involved riding in a moving railroad car and taking pictures of the noises that were produced when the car was equipped with seats covered with rattan and then, in the same car with mohair or velmo-upholstered seats. The pictures showed conclusively that mohair afforded considerably quieter riding conditions. The velmo "sound traps" had literally swallowed up a confusion of echoes that would have bounced back and made the interior of the car noisier. The high-pitched noises especially, the ones that are the most disturbing, were most effectively reduced.

Another test was made in automobiles covered with various kinds of upholstery. Again, mohair velvet or velmo showed its superiority as a sound-deadener. Similar tests are being made in offices and in homes to show that quieter and therefore more enjoyable and more restful interiors can be had by the judicious use of velmo upholstery.

All is Ready for the 4-H Club Program Today

The local 4-H Club is all set to be in Holt today to hold their achievement day celebration. Mr. H. F. Harrison of Warren and Mr. H. A. Pflughoeft of the Northwest School at Crookston will be here to explain the main features of the occasion and to judge the exhibits.

The club has made special efforts to have their projects in first class shape for the day and it is estimated that there will be close competition for the prizes offered.

The Holt Commercial Club will donate first prizes to the owners of the best dairy and beef calves and second prizes to the owners of the second best. There will also be a prize for showmanship, cooking, and sewing.

Free lunch will be served to the club members, leaders and judges.

The program will commence at 2.30 p. m. and will be held on Main Street, where the judging will also be done.

The members of the club will give several numbers on the program. Following is the program as scheduled for the afternoon:

Parade—Sunnyside Harmonica Band in lead
Song—Holt Quartette
Address of Welcome — Geo. Fricker
Music—Dutch Band
Debate—by Club Members
Speech—by Miss Doris Leiran
Remarks—by John Augustine and John Benitt, Club Leaders
Song—Holt Quartette
Talks—by H. F. Harrison and H. A. Pflughoeft
Judging and Showmanship
Prize Awarding

The prizes will consist of leather halters and lead strap for the first prizes and lead strap and chain for the second prizes. Something useful in their line will be given the winners in the cooking and sewing projects.

We are proud to have such an active group as the local club has proven itself to be, and we ask all who possibly can, to turn out Friday afternoon and take in the program, and see the exhibits and the judging of the 4-H Club projects.

Good Roads Lessens Isolation

There are millions of farmers in the United States who, when winter comes, are almost as completely cut off from the outside world as if they were in darkest Africa. They have the vehicles--but the roads serving them have not been essentially improved since the days of the horse and wagon.

The world of today is largely dependent for its social and economic progress, on quick and certain transport. What the railroads mean on long hauls, good roads mean to the farmer on short hauls. They allow him to sell his goods at the best possible time, to buy supplies on short notice, to get quick medical help when needed. They aid small town merchants by bringing them business that otherwise could not reach them.

States and counties will not have done their duty to the farmer until every farming area is provided with dustless, mudless, weatherproof, feeder roads. Modern road building and surfacing methods make such roads available today at moderate cost.

Co. 4-H Club Achievement Day

The county 4-H Club achievement day will be held at Warren on Saturday, October 10, with winning entries in various projects will be entered in competition in the final show event of the season's work.

The event at Warren will be of great interest to all the clubs in the county, as twelve free trips to the Junior Livestock Show at South St. Paul will be awarded to outstanding workers.

Mrs. Karen Sagstuen

Mrs. Karen Sagstuen was born in Ringsaker, Norway, Sept. 1, 1855. In 1873 she was married to Andrew L. Sagstuen. In 1855 they came to this country, settled down in Chippewa county for a while, later moving to Holt, where she lived until Sept. 24, 1931, when she died at the age of 76 years, three weeks and three days. She leaves to mourn her loss four sons and one daughter, namely, Lars, Anton, Ludvig and Carsten, and Mrs. Iver Engebretson, all of Holt, except Lars. She also leaves a sister, Mrs. Hans Saugen of Newfolden, and thirteen grandchildren and one great grandchild..

GETTING BUSINESS GLOOM BEHIND US

By ROME C. STEPHENSON
President American Bankers Association

R. C. STEPHENSON

THERE is such a thing as over-staying a depression just as there is of over-staying a boom. Over-confidence makes the great majority miss the turn in a boom, and under-confidence makes them miss it in a depression. A leading New York banker was asked recently when he could tell that a turn for the better had come. "About three months after it has happened," he candidly replied.

There is more significance in that remark than appears on the surface. As more and more manufacturers and business men realize that the turn has already come and that they are over-staying the time to adopt constructive policies, they begin cautiously to press their selling campaigns, to speed up their production, to enlarge their working forces and increase their commitments for supplies. It is the gathering weight of their influences that finally raises the pressure of confidence to the dynamic power of recovery.

The surest way to bring the nation out of the business depression is to raise the pressure of public confidence to the point of becoming such a dynamic force. It has invariably been the push of that force which has started recovery in the past, and it is the gathering power of this force which will start recovery from this present depression.

It is a favorable sign of the times that there seems to be general agreement that the bottom of the depression has been reached and all eyes are peeled and looking ahead for the first indications that the turn for the better is in sight. Who knows but what the first thing we know we will find ourselves looking backward instead of forward as we realize that the turn has already come. It is a rough and rocky road that runs across the bottom of the valley of business depression, and most of us are too busy steering the old Ford from bump to bump to be able to take in all the scenery. So who knows but what some important changes in the landscape are already taking place.

Pangborn & Herndon Make Ocean Hop From Tokio

Clyde Pangborn and Hugh Herndon landed at Wenatchee, Wash., on Monday after completing the first non-stop aeroplane crossing of the Pacific ocean from Tokio, Japan.

The American barnstorming aviators made one of the most dangerous ocean hops ever attempted, flying nearly 4,500 miles in 41 hour and 13 minutes.

They were awarded $25,000 by a Tokio newspaper for being the first ones to make this non-stop flight.

Car Smashup

Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Mostue and son of Thief River Falls met with an automobile accident here early Friday evening. Mrs. Mostue and son Ebenezer, had motored up from Thief River and gone out to the Wilson school in Mud Lake, which Mr. Mostue is teaching this year, to bring him home over the week end.

They were on their way home and had gotten as far as to the turn unto the new highway north of town, when young Mostue failed to see a truck coming north on the highway with the result that it hit their new Chev on the side and tore off a rear wheel and smashed up many of the windows in the car.

Mr. Mostue received a broken arm and is at the present time in a hospital in Thief River with pneumonia and his condition is serious. Mrs. Mostue, who also is in the hospital, received a broken clavicle and many bad bruises about the face and chest. Their son who drove the car escaped with only a bad shaking up.

Theo. Ness took the injured peple to Thief River.

Mrs. Elmer Johnson of Middle River was the driver of the truck but she and a companion escaped unhurt.

Both machines had to be hauled in for repairs.

Teachers Given Reception

The people of Holt and community gathered at the school house on Saturday evening and gave the local school faculty a reception.

Geo. Fricker was chairman for the entertainment committee which had arranged for a very interesting program for the occasion.

R. A. Werner, president of the local board of education gave the address of welcome.

Wm. Peterson of St. Hilaire played two piano solos.

E. O. Nybakken, superintendent of the school gave a very interesting response in behalf of the faculty, and he assured the people that all the teachers were pleased with their work and that they all liked our school and community first rate.

After the program the crowd enjoyed a fine lunch and spent the evening visiting.

Out of town visitors who attended the reception were: Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Peterson and Mr. and Mrs. Earl Jenson from St. Hilaire.

Skim-milk as a Protein Feed

Many farmers are using skim-milk as a very successful substitute for linseed meal to supply the protein in the ration. One gallon of skim-milk is equal to one pound of linseed meal and may be fed in that proportion, giving even better results than the meal and also utilizing what might otherwise be a waste product.

The following makes a good balanced ration for a 1000 to 1200 pound cow giving an average flow of milk:

Corn silage	30 lbs.
Prairie hay	10 "
Bran	4 "
Barley	3 "
Oats	3 "
Skim-milk	2 gallons.

Color in Market Basket

The newest findings indicate that the yellow plant pigment, termed carotone, is the forerunner of vitamin A in the body, although it is potent in extremely minute amounts.

For some time it has been observed that various yellow vegetable food products seem to furnish the equivalent of vitamin A, the food factor that is abundant in butter and in cod liver oil. Yellow corn is more effective than the white varieties, the yellow sweet potato is richer than the ordinary white potato; and the yellow carrot abounds in something that can avert the lack of vitamin A in the dietary.

Light Affects Ocean Plants

Sunlight influences life even in the deep sea, says Prof. W. E. Allen, of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography, at La Jolla, Calif.

Diatoms, minute living creatures of delicate color and beautiful forms, are more spiny and slender at considerable depths, he says, than those living nearer the surface.

Professor Allen holds that this attenuated form is a response to the feeble light, being the form affording the best conditions for absorbing the energy of light.

—24—

"Margaret, I am glad to have heard of these things," said William. "They help me to understand this drooping mouth of yours, the sadness in your eyes and voice."

"I am like most of the others here," she went on. "They have lived in terror and thick darkness lighted by the flash of death fires. Some have heard the cry of the martyr. Some have nearly perished of cold and hunger in the first comings and have seen their friends sicken and die for the lack of wholesome food. When you complain of the sternness of the church folk and look at their sober faces I beg of you think of these things, my boy. We are jealous of our candle in the wilderness, knowing how easily it could flicker out. We hate the evils that flourish in the courts of kings. If we were not stern with them we should soon be again a handful among a people as godless as those from whom we fled. We should bring to these shores not our own kind but sinners who do not find it now a comfortable place. By and by some cunning head, perhaps of Stuart blood, would come and rally them around him and set up a throne and put us again in bondage. Mr. Williams has charged that we have ourselves set up a tyranny, but we only demand of our people virtue and honor and good faith and fair dealing, and a proper respect for the Creator of the world lest we all be drowned in damnation."

"I respect the church," said William, "but I do think that it should have more love and charity for those outside its membership. It has established a spiritual aristocracy as stony hearted as that around the throne of our King Charles. They regard, or seem to regard, outsiders as enemies fighting under the flag of Satan. They are not that. They are brother human beings to be led upward into the ranks by love and sympathy and help and a forgiving spirit."

Near nine o'clock that evening Peggy and her brother come to see William with important news. Peggy was in high spirits. James Rosewell had returned.

"He brought me great happiness," said Peggy. "It was shut up in this tiny housing of gold."

She held up the shining locket, saying: "I lent it to Robert the night he went away. He gave it to Rosewell to bring to me. I found in it a secret—a wonderful secret. I am the happiest person in this world. He is alive. He is well. I had to come and tell you."

In a transport of joy she threw her arms around William and kissed him.

"I think that I can guess the secret," he said.

"I am sure that you can. He still loves me and may the good God keep him! The rest I cannot tell you now. You see, this little thing has a secret lock. It is like the riddle of Samson. It holds a mystery. No one can reach it save those who know how. Robert would not be denied. He got its secret. Observe the warning lettered in Greek on its case. It says:

" 'Only the true lover can open this.' "

"And are you going to England?" William asked.

"Only if God wills it," Peggy answered. "It is late and we must go. I hope you will soon come to visit us at Moondawn. That is the name of our new home. From my windows I see the rising of the two kings of light."

"I shall come when the war ends," said William.

They went away. Margaret had gone to bed. William sat a long time by the fireside thinking as he smoked his pipe while the wind whistled in the chimney. His thinking was mostly of Robert. Should he return to England? he asked himself. But he was going to the war with the Pequots and who could tell what would come of that?

* * * * * * *

Margaret Hooper felt the force of William's argument about the church and discussed it with her sisters of the parish. Many fell into his way of thinking. It came to the ears of John Winthrop who forthwith invited William to his house. The great man and his wife received the boy warmly.

"The sweet and cunning hand of Nature has wrought a wonderful work upon you," said Winthrop when they were seated by the fireside. "You have the face of a saint. May I ask just what is your criticism of the church?"

"My position is that of one humbly seeking the truth," William answered. "My opinions are privately expressed. I would not create dissension, knowing as I do that the church is the mainstay of law and order. Now that you ask my opinions I give them to you frankly. I have had to learn how to forgive and be humble. If it has been good for me to learn those things I conclude that it would be good for the church."

He then briefly presented his argument, as he had done with Margaret Hooper.

"The work you have started among the poor may make the things of your vision possible," Winthrop answered. "I look forward to a time when the children of every poor man will be educated and led upward to apply their hearts to understanding and the love of all good things. This, I hope, will be done at the public expense. That work has already begun—thanks to you."

Next day William went away to the war with his company. Two weeks later the town was in a fever of excitement. John Samp had arrived with Robert Heathers and Amos Todkill. Within half an hour the news had reached a thousand ears. The court was in session. Its seats and anteroom were soon crowded. The constable and his prisoner, waiting in a house near, were summoned to the court. John Samp entered with Robert Heathers, his wrists manacled, followed by Amos Todkill. Robert was smiling. Governor Vane asked the constable why his prisoner was in irons.

"Your excellency, he struck me."

In a calm voice, standing with his hat in his hand, Todkill spoke: "I hope that you will ask the prisoner why he struck the constable."

Governor Vane turned to the prisoner with a look of inquiry, whereupon Robert said: "Your excellency, I struck only because in ill temper he called me a vile name."

Samp undertook to speak but the governor put him to silence, saying: "A prisoner is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is proved, and if he obeys the officer, should be treated with all possible respect and subjected to no unnecessary harshness."

He turned to Robert and told him that he was accused of adultery with one Mabel Hartley, then deceased, on the twelfth of the last October. He presented the evidence against him supported by the fact that he had fled from the jurisdiction of the court. The governor asked the young man if he wished to take counsel before he pleaded.

Robert answered: "Your excellency, I shall need only the counsel of my own conscience, but I have just arrived here. I am weary and in need of rest. Give me time, I pray you, to compose myself and leave to confer with my friends."

His plea was granted and Robert was sent to the prison house for the night. His purpose was to see William, if possible, and be apprised of what had come to pass. Amos learned that William had gone out with Captain Mason to fight the Pequots. He learned that Peggy Weld had built a house on a lake in the deep greenwood about three miles from the edge of the town and was there. He was told that a good path led to it.

The spring had come early and warm. It was in the moon of the bright lights late in April. The buds were coming out. Amos got a horse and road to Peggy's house. The early dusk was falling. Amos dismounted, hitched his horse at a post and, entering the veranda through gray-barked, spruce columns, pulled the latchstring of the door. Peggy sat with her brother before a blazing fire playing cards.

"I am Amos Todkill," he said.

The two rose to their feet. "Amos Todkill!" Peggy Weld exclaimed. "Where is Robert?"

"I hate to bring bad news to Paradise," said Amos in a low tone that reflected his depression. "I hate it no less than the gates o' hell. Robert is in Boston prison."

For a breath the girl stood looking at him, her hand upon her breast.

"In prison!" she whispered. "So—they have brought him here. I will go to him at once."

She sent a servant to the stable for her horse. She turned to her brother, saying: "Henry, you do not need to go. Todkill will be with me through the forest and there is room for me at the governor's house. I shall want to talk with him before I go to the prison."

She stopped by the path side. "Tell me quickly how it happens that you and Robert came to Boston," she said.

Briefly Amos told the story of Rosewell's trap.

"Well, let us make haste," she answered. "It is growing dark."

They hastened into the dim forest aisle and onward as rapidly as its rough footing would allow and were soon in sight of the beacons. The governor was at home. He said:

"Miss Weld, lay off your coat and sit down and tell me what I can do for you."

"As soon as possible I want to see Robert Heathers," she answered.

In his most gracious and gentle manner the governor spoke these friendly words: "I know that you have stood for Robert Heathers in this sorry business while the rest of us have had no doubt of his guilt. I question your judgment and also admire the noble quality of your friendship. My dear, I do advise you to keep your hands clean of this matter. I would gladly save him if I could but he will, I fear, go to the gallows. You cannot help him. You will only increase his wretchedness."

Peggy Weld was in no way discouraged by this dark counsel.

"Governor, it is my duty to go. William is away and I am the only friend that he has in this town. Surely it is his right to know what has come to pass in his absence and to receive friendly advice."

"Have you new evidence?"

"New evidence," she answered. "And it is of such a nature that I shall ask you to allow me to present it to the court in my own way. I am a woman and it will be an uncommon proceeding, but I shall not impose on the dignity or the patience of the court. What I have to say can be quickly said and you shall hear no malicious or improper words."

The governor lighted his pipe and said: "Why should not women be heard in such a democracy as we aim to establish? There is no man in the colony who is the equal of Anna Hutchinson in wit or diction or in her power to see straight to the heart of a subject. I shall call on you for a statement of your case tomorrow morning. There are precedents in the procedure of the English courts. I shall never forget my father's vivid account of the remarkable speech of the great Queen Bess at the trial of Mary of the Scots. I am sure that we shall get from you a shining example of what a woman can do."

"Do not expect me to be brilliant. I am no Anne Hutchinson. But I promise to be honest and well behaved, and I shall pray God to help me to show the women of Boston that cricketing in idle gossip is a poor kind of business to be doing."

She could have said nothing more pleasing to the governor. Forthwith he sat down at his table and hurriedly wrote a note and sent a servant to deliver it to the prison warden.

"This man is deaf—very deaf," said the governor. "There are times when I need such a servant. He is a most respectable looking creature and he understands every movement of my hand. I shall send him into the room with you and Robert. You can talk freely. He will not hear you."

Peggy was shown to a room beyond the warden's office where prisoners were brought to see their counsel and their friends. The servant stood erect in a corner, his halberd at his side. Robert entered. He was pale and thin but still as straight as an arrow. The two met in the middle of the room and embraced each other. For a moment neither spoke.

"I thought that I would be braver than this," said Peggy as she wiped her eyes. "Come, let us sit down together."

In a cheery tone she told him of William's refusal to plead and of his confinement, of the testimony against him, of the circumstances that led to his release, of the humiliation of the hempen rope, of his courageous conduct which had won the admiration of the community, of the growing conviction that he, Robert Heathers, was guilty because he had fled from the jurisdiction of the court and refused to return to it, of William's going with Captain Mason to fight against the Pequots.

"Now I am to be your lawyer and for once in your life I shall ask you to obey my wishes," said Peggy. "You will be brought into court tomorrow. You will of course plead that you are not guilty. I think that I know of evidence that will delay action until it can be produced in court. I have seen men fail so often there that I am going to see what a woman can accomplish with those sturdy, iron magistrates. Their wives have no trouble in managing them."

"I had already determined to plead that I am not guilty," said Robert. "I suppose that they will hang me. I saw my fate in those stern faces on the bench. Well, I have suffered so many terrors that dying seems easy, and then I have learned one thing from the red man. It is fortitude. I have seen one of them die twenty deaths without a murmur!"

Peggy held his hand in hers and said: "Whatever happens tomorrow after you have pleaded, hold your peace and let no word pass your lips. For once—just once I must do all the talking. I wish that I could sit with you the whole night, but we must both seek our rest and the governor is waiting for me."

"Erasmus Alms Box"

Erasmus, noted scholar and reformer of the Sixteenth century, with his friend Dean Colet, founder of St. Paul's school, visited St. Nicholas' almshouse, in England, and one of the brethren ordered a holy relic for them to kiss, as was the custom before sprinkling guests with holy water, writes Lovinia Walsh in the Boston Transcript. The relic in this case was a part of a shoe once worn by St. Thomas of Canterbury. The dean, it seems, was not kissing anybody's old shoes. He forthwith got hot under his clerical collar and became rhetorically hectic.

The scholarly Erasmus, on the contrary, was most courteous, and to make amends for the dean's misbehavior, he dropped a goodly sum into the alms box. Ever after, this box was known as "The Erasmus Alms Box."

Old Idea Refuted

A scientist of the United States coast and geodetic survey declares that there is no foundation for the belief that the winter climate of northeastern United States could be moderated by changing the course of the Gulf stream.

Named for Emperor

The month of August was named for Augustus Caesar by the Roman senate. It previously had been called Sextilis. July had been named for Julius Caesar, and Augustus thought he should have equal honor.

Soil Leaves Record

The soil that covers a buried city sometimes indicates the manner in which it was buried—for instance, if the city is buried in sand it is reasonable to believe that some terrific sandstorm enveloped it. On the other hand, if the overlaying earth is volcanic in character, it is indicated that some eruption caused the loss of the city. For many cases historical records are available telling of the nature of the catastrophe.

Baby Carriage in Museum

The baby carriage has been placed in the collection of vehicles of transport at the Smithsonian institution. For some reason no one ever thought of including a perambulator until one of them, bought in 1863, was donated to the institution. The carriage differs from the modern four-wheel perambulator. It looks like a miniature one-horse shay, has two wheels and is pulled by a long handle.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Bargaining for Victory

As an example of the religious concepts of the pagan world of the Greek and Roman classical period the story is told of two cities, at war with each other, both soliciting the god Apollo at Delphi for victory. One offered a tenth of the spoil to the shrine for victory. The other, hearing the offer, offered a ninth, thus assuring victory for themselves.

City's Liberty Tree

The Providence (R. I.) Journal says that on July 25, 1769, the liberty tree of Providence was dedicated in front of Capt. James Olney's house, on Olney lane, now Olney street, by the Sons of Liberty. Among the lower branches a platform was built from which speeches were made. The tree was cut down about 1825.

Not an Old Idea

Prints and calico are of great antiquity, but the printed cotton cloth which is highly calendered and known as calico in England, appears to have been first developed, to a point approximating its present perfection, in the Eighteenth century.

Annapolis Gay City

The nickname "The Paris of the Colonies," was applied to Annapolis. From a little settlement on the Severn in 1664 it grew in size and importance until it became the capital of Maryland. By 1750 it was famed for its gayety and luxury.

Odd Roman Custom

In ancient Rome it was the custom, when honoring a victorious general, to place behind the chariot in which he rode to the capitol a slave who kept repeating amidst the shouts of the crowd, "Beware lest you fall!"

Deserves Plaudits

It is not he that enters upon any career, or he that runs in any race, but he who runs well and perseveringly that gains the plaudits of others or the approval of his own conscience.—Campbell.

Adventurers Extolled

The expression, "England was made by adventurers, not by its government" is attributed to Gen. Charles Gordon, better known as Chinese Gordon, who was killed in the defense of Khartum.

Reflection Needed

As a man without forethought scarcely deserves the name of a man, so forethought without reflection is but a metaphorical phase for the instinct of a beast.—Coleridge.

Paris Older Than Berlin

Paris was first mentioned in authentic history in the year 53 B. C. The history of the city of Berlin dates from the early part of the Thirteenth century.

Heartening Event

Probably the only thing more heartening than to run across an old vest and find a forgotten dime in the pocket is to run across an old vest when you need a new seat in your trousers.—Detroit News.

Simple Fishing Method

Natives of South America and East Indies extract a poison from tropical plants, especially from the "cube," which they pour into a stream. The fish become intoxicated or stupefied and the primitive fishermen then gather them in.

Goldenrod and Hay Fever

Goldenrod is cross-fertilized by butterflies and bees, and is a typical insect-pollinated plant. The pollen gives a positive hay fever reaction, but, not being wind-borne, can cause hay fever only upon direct inhalation.

"Open" and "Closed" Seas

Mare clausum is a Latin phrase meaning closed sea, and is applied to a sea closed by a certain power or powers to the unrestricted trade of other nations. The free and open sea is called mare liberum.

Hebrew Alphabets

The present Hebrew alphabet is not the original one, which was probably derived from the Phoenician, but is believed to be the one derived from the ancient Aramaic.

Linnaeus' Idea

The idea of inserting a grain of sand in a mussel shell, so that the mussel would build a pearl around the irritating sand, was suggested by the Swedish naturalist, Linnaeus.

Meaning of "Letter"

Our word "letter" is derived from the Latin root meaning "to smear." In ancient days letters were smeared or scrawled on parchment instead of being cut into a tablet.

One of the most important things you can do to make a teething baby comfortable is to see that little bowels do their work of carrying off waste matter promptly and regularly. For this nothing is better than Castoria, a pure vegetable preparation specially made for babies and children. Castoria acts so gently you can give it to young infants to relieve colic. Yet it is always effective, for older children, too. Remember, Castoria contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics—is absolutely harmless. When your baby is fretful with teething or a food upset, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Be sure you get genuine Castoria with the name:

WHEN FOOD SOURS

ABOUT two hours after eating many people suffer from sour stomachs. They call it indigestion. It means that the stomach nerves have been over-stimulated. There is excess acid. The way to correct it is with an alkali, which neutralizes many times its volume in acid.

The right way is Phillips Milk of Magnesia—just a tasteless dose in water. It is pleasant, efficient and harmless. Results come almost instantly. It is the approved method. You will never use another when you know.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips Milk of Magnesia prescribed by physicians for correcting excess acids. 25c and 50c a bottle—any drugstore.

Find Trinkets Hidden in Old Pueblo Homes

Indian maidens who lived in New Mexico a thousands or more year ago did not have safety deposit vaults in which to store their jewelry, so they hid it in the walls of their pueblos instead. W. W. Postlewaite, treasurer of Colorado college, recently returned from an expedition during which he excavated the ancient pueblo of Chetro Ketl in Chaco canyon in the New Mexican Navajo desert. He said that an Indian workman opened a small hole in the adobe wall of a house and found a string of 1,045 jet and white beads. In a nearby pocket a large number of small bits of turquoise were discovered. Postlewaite believes that the discovery of the ornaments means that it was the custom to secrete valuables in the masonry of structures when Chetro Ketl was inhabited hundreds of years ago.

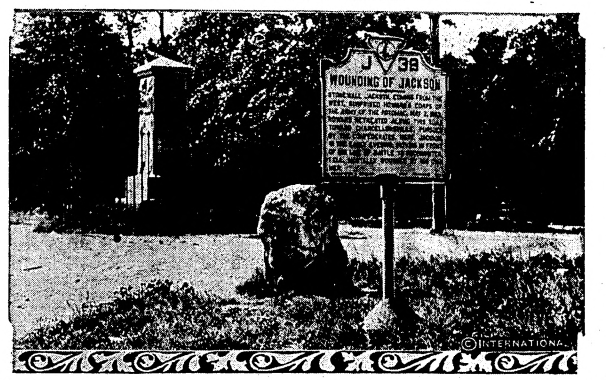
Wilderness Is to Be a National Park



The section of Virginia, about fifteen miles long and ten wide, where was fought the Battle of the Wilderness has been designated by the government as a national park and work is under way. The view above is of the spot where Gen. Stonewall Jackson was accidentally shot by his own troops. Within the area named were fought the battles of Fredericksburg, Spottsylvania and Chancellorsville.

To Plant Gardens Above Radio City

Roofs to Be Landscaped at Cost of 18 Millions.

New York.—The Rockefeller interests have revealed details of the plans for transforming the roofs and terraces of the ten structures in the $250,000,000 Radio City here into what is intended to be a modern equivalent of the hanging gardens of Babylon, to include illuminated waterfalls and promenades among tall trees planted far above the street.

The largest of the first three units will be a 66-story office skyscraper, with 16-story wing, to take up more than half of the center block in the area bounded by Fifth and Sixth avenues, Forty-eighth and Fifty-first streets. This unit will have a total floor space of 2,500,000 square feet, about 350,000 feet more than is contained in the Empire State building.

About Ready to Start.

The second will be the International Music hall, planned for the west half of the block between Fiftieth and Fifty-first streets, with a 31-story office building flanking it on the Sixth avenue frontage. The third unit is a sound motion picture theater for the west part of the block between Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth streets.

Excavation work on the sites of those structures is well advanced and construction will start this fall. The theaters are scheduled to be finished by Ootcber 1, 1932, and the office building the following spring. Plans for seven other buildings have been drawn. A large area in the lower block has been left for possible use by the Metropolitan Opera company for a new opera house, concerning which negotiations still are pending.

The garden plans call for seven acres of landscaping with waterfalls, fountains, pools, trees, formal flower beds, and statuary. Plans for covering the outer walls of the buildings with a lacework of living ivy also are a tentative part of the beautification program.

A Curved Waterfall.

An acre of ground space will be given over to a sunken plaza with a 30-foot fountain in the center. The Rockefeller interests estimated that more than $17,500,000 worth of land will be left open for beautification, and between $250,000 and $500,000 will be spent on landscaping.

Forty feet above the roof of the 16-story wing of the center building will be a curved waterfall with a 50-foot spillway and cascades ending in a reflecting pool, about 80 by 25 feet, on the roof. Thirty-foot trees and other landscaping will form its background.

Two levels of landscaping are planned above the studios of the National Broadcasting company, in the lower roof areas between the main building and the main east wall of the 16-story wing.

They will be connected by stairways and will resemble a formal garden on some suburban estate.

On the north side of the music hall and south side of the sound theater there will be 30-foot hedges of beech, hemlock and linden trees. The remainder of these roofs will be devoted to formal gardens. Trees rising to a height of 30 and 35 feet will be a part of the general scheme.

Bombing Planes Used in War on Mosquitos

Experiment Tried in Panama Proves Effective.

Washington.—Bombing planes have been used with such success in combating malarial mosquitos in the Panama Canal Zone, the office of the chief of the air corps has been advised that similar tactics may be employed by airplanes over insect infected sections of the United States.

The apparatus is so simple that it can be placed in a large plane of the bombing type within 15 minutes. The poisonous mixture is also simple and cheap, one part by weight of paris green being mixed with four parts by weight of dust obtained from local clay.

The results showed clearly that the mixture destroyed the malarial carrier in the larvae stage, but failed to kill other varieties of mosquitos which, although not dangerous, constitute a pest. Oil mixture is believed to be effective against these nonmalarial insects.

A bombing plane was selected as the most suitable type of aircraft with which to conduct the mosquito dusting operations, because of its greater weight-carrying ability, and for the further reason that it permitted the placing of the dusting apparatus without modifying the structure of the plane in any way.

The mosquito-breeding area was first dusted on July 28 and thereafter at weekly intervals. On each trip two flights were made with approximately 600 pounds of the dusting mixture. The time required for each flight was from fifteen to twenty minutes, the actual dusting operations consuming from ten to twelve minutes.

The altitude of the bomber was from 20 to 40 feet. The report stated that it is necessary to repeat the dusting at weekly intervals to destroy all larvae before they can develop into the mosquito, and that from seven to ten dustings in the malaria season will kill practically all the larvae of the malaria variety.

Century Old Clock Is Keeping Perfect Time

Belfast, N. Y.—The wooden cogs in a century old clock were spinning at full tilt here today. Jerome F. Gleason, reclaimed the timepiece, which was built in 1822, from attic dust. He found the wheels jammed with dust and soot and the face broken. A few hours of tinkering put it in shape, and now, Gleason says, it "keeps railroad time."

The object of all satire is to make people see where they are wrong.

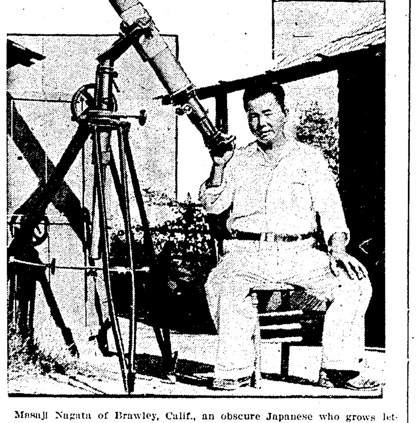
Knut Holm is the only child of a young Danish farmer of the same name. For twenty-three generations all male Holms have been christened "Knut."

Truck Gardener Discovers New Comet



Masaji Nagata of Brawley, Calif., an obscure Japanese who grows lettuce and cantaloupes by day and studies the heavens by night, is credited with the discovery of a brand-new comet. The finding of the forty-four-year-old Oriental was announced by the Mt. Wilson observatory. Dr. F. H. Seares, acting head of the observatory, said that in all probability the comet would be named after its discoverer.

Heat in Arctic Causes Herring Eggs to Freeze

London.—There have been several complaints about warm weather in the Arctic this summer, but it remained for British scientists to make the first official protest in behalf of herrings, which have been driven from the North sea.

The herrings were forced to migrate because of frigid water. The scientists explained that heat in the Arctic produces very cold currents. They estimated that only 1 per cent of the herring eggs would hatch, thus causing British deep-sea fishers to lose large amounts of money.

Elephant Knocked Out, but He's Never Down

Norwalk, Conn.—An elephant was in the embarrassing position of being out but not down here. The driver of an elephant truck of a circus tried to drive under a low bridge. The elephant's head protruded. The bridge scored a clean knockout. The truck was so narrow, however, that the beast just leaned dizzily against the sides and the truck continued on.

Make Individual Rules for Long, Healthy Life

"Every intelligent person reaching maturity ought to know what he needs in the way of food, sleep, work and play," says Secretary of the Interior Wilbur in the Woman's Home Companion. "What is good for one person may not be good for the second. We differ in body vagaries as we do in mental. It is nonsense to believe that we all can do the same thing in the same way. The man of fifty in an office hasn't the physical endurance of an athlete at school; the woman at home who has raised several children may react differently to physical recreation from the woman at a desk.

"It's a wise thing to remember that moderation is an excellent principle to go by. The human body can stand almost anything in moderation. But what is moderation for one may be indulgence for another. Every one must find out for himself what his body can do and govern his habits accordingly. This doesn't mean pampering the body. Far from it. It means that we have discovered the truth that the body is an excellent vehicle for happiness and service if we treat it properly.

"A time will come, I hope, when to complain of illness, to lose time at work because of illness, will be a disgrace. That day will come when we have buried the traditions of the past and their devastating effects; when we have broken clear of histories of personal ill health, of poor nervous systems, of bodies weakened by disease in one way or another."

Cold facts can be "hot."

Miss Anne Engebretson of Duluth arrived Friday to attend the funeral of her grandmother, and to visit relatives, returning last week.

Disfugalty Over Hi-way X-ing

The new highway is closed at the Soo Line crossing between here and Thief River Falls until the state highway department and railroad decide on what type of crossing, gates, signals, elevation, curve, grade, overhead, viaduct, or just plain road is to be used at the crossing.

A number of families from town and country gathered at the home of Mr. and Mrs. T. Kolden on Sunday afternoon. The ladies gave Mrs. Kolden a parcel shower, and the men spent the time playing horseshoe. A delicious lunch was served by the self invited guests.

Visited Southern Minnesota

Wm. Koepp and daughter Mata returned home last week from Painsville where they had spent a week visiting relatives.

Mr. Koepp told us that after he saw what condition the farmers were in down there, he decided that this is a paradise in which we live up here.

Sweets for Children

"GOODY! An invitation to another birthday party!"

The tiny pink envelope is opened eagerly and handed to Mother, who smiles pleasantly—but has inward qualms. A birthday party is a glorious today, but Mother's experience has been that many a birthday party embodies the carefree philosophy of "save your sorrow for tomorrow."

Yet birthdays come but once a year and no mother likes to be a joy-killer on these illustrious occasions when stomachaches are things not to be thought of, much less mentioned. Well-meaning health exponents have offered various solutions, prune-whips and carrot boats predominating. But who wants to eat prune-whips and carrot boats at parties?

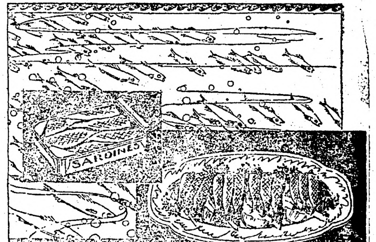
Foods For Good Fairies

A graduate dietitian, a young mother, recently gave a party that was universally approved by both youngsters and parents. It was a fairy frolic, and the table featured a fairy-princess alighted on a hill of daisies on a grass-green cloth. The sandwiches were cut in star and crescent shapes — jelly on whole-wheat bread and crushed pineapple on white bread, small mugs of warm malted milk, a pretty fruit salad topped by a white cloud of whipped cream, and the climax was angel ice-cream in tiny sponge-cake baskets.

When the good-byes and "lovely times" were being said, a mother confided to the hostess that it was the first time her daughter had ever been induced to eat healthful fruit salads or drink cocoa malted drinks.

Many of our favorite dishes were first eaten at some special event—a dinner, banquet or other entertainment, and children's parties will be welcomed by parents, if they stimulate a desire for foods that are healthful.*

The Orderly Sardine



GLIDING through the water, head to tail, in schools, packed side by side in the can, broiled and carefully arranged on toast triangles — the sardine is everywhere orderly.

Meticulous processes, from the net to the toast, are necessary to present this tiny fish in his silvery perfection. The stage is set, in France, Norway, Portugal, Japan, China, West Indies, Chili, New Zealand and on our Pacific coast, so that when the fish are in the finest condition they can be caught in weirs or nets without delay. Fisherman and canner work together, clock-fashion, for the delicate fish must be delivered from the sea to the cannery in from one to three hours.

Care in Canning

At most canneries, rows of women workers snip the sardines' heads off with scissors. Placed in small wicker baskets, they are then washed in clear cold water, put into a strong brine, and left from twenty minutes to an hour. Dipped out, still in wire baskets, they go to the flaking room where they are laid in neat rows on trays or "flakes." Then arranged, one by one, in wire baskets, tails upward, they remain in the open air, usually one hour, to be dried. Next the little fish is ready for his hot oil bath. In wire baskets they are lowered into boiling olive oil and closely watched—because too much cooking will spoil their silver coats.

Packing them into the can "just so" is the final step. Whether they are European sardines and seek the company of truffles, pickles, spices and fresh tarragon leaves, or American sardines who favor mustard, olive oil and tomato sauce, they appear, when you roll back the lid of the can—silvery, orderly, perfect.*

4-H CLUB ACHIEVEMENT DAY LAST FRIDAY WENT OVER BIG

People of Holt Are Given Ample Proof That the Local 4-H Club is a Live Wire Organization; Eight Members Win Prizes

The local 4-H club celebrated their annual achievement day here on Friday and a crowd of several hundred people were in attendance for the occasion. The exhibits of the various projects worked by the club this year were of the best in the county and the club members were congratulated upon their success and showing made this year.

A large and snappy program was held at the high school auditorium in the afternoon with the local Commercial Club in charge, and members of the 4-H Club and business men taking part.

Miss Doris Leiran, president of the local 4-H Club, gave a fine talk to the members and audience.

There was a hot debate between a team of three members on each side, discussing the question of which was the most profitable, the dairy calf or the beef calf. The affirmative side, which chose the dairy calf, won out.

Mr. Fricker gave the address of welcome, and leaders of the club also gave a few remarks.

Mr. Pflughoeft of the Northwest School, Crookston, and Mr. Harrison, of the Agricultural Division of the Warren Public Schools, gave the main talks regarding the work of the club and its projects.

Following the program the Dutch Band led the crowd up town where the calves were judged and winners announced.

Stilof Anderson won the showmanship contest.

In the dairy calf contest Gertrude Voth won first prize and Frederick Voth won second.

In the beef calf contest Reuben Benitt won first and Clifford Moberg won second.

In the sewing contest, Eleanor Larson won first prize and Doris Leiran second.

In the baking contest Vivian Larson won first prize.

Following the judging, which was done by Mr. Pflughoeft and Mr. Harrison, the club members were taken to the Free Mission church parlors where they were the guests of the local Commercial Club at a lunch and were awarded the prize, which were donated by the business men of Holt, and which consisted of a fine blanket for showmanship; leather halters for the first in the dairy and beef projects; lead chains and straps for second in these projects. silk stockings for the sewing girls and a baking dish for the baking project.

It was a grand doing and the business men of Holt are backing the 4-H Club a hundred per cent to win in the big contests in the future.

Club Member Awarded Trip to Saint Paul

Several people from here attended the annual county 4-H club achievement day held down at Warren on Saturday. Three members of the local 4-H club took their calves down there to be judged for the Junior Livestock Show in So. St. Paul.

They were: Gertude Voth, Reuben Benitt and Lewis Sagstuen. Lewis placed fourth in the county with his beef calf and was awarded a trip to the show.

Skomedal-Torgerson

Miss Amanda Skomedal, daughter of Mrs. Skomedal, and Mr. Melvin Torgerson, son of Mr. and Mrs. Silas Torgerson, from the Silver Creek community were united in marriage here on Sunday at 11 o'clock, at the Nazareth Lutheran parsonage, with Rev. Redal reading the wedding ceremony.

Miss Emma Skomedal, a sister of the bride was bridesmaid and Carl Torgerson, a brother of the groom acted as best man. Mrs. Skomedal and Mrs. Torgerson, mothers of the young couple were in attendance at the wedding.

Following the ceremony the bridal party and Rev. and Mrs. Redal motored out to the home of the bride where a wedding dinner was served to a host of relatives.

The newlyweds left the same day for a ten day honeymoon trip thru the iron range country.

Rev. and Mrs. Redal, Mrs. O. Nohre, Mrs. L. Wegge and Mrs. G. Sanoden attended the Women's Missionary Federation of the Thief River Circuit, at the Zion church four miles northeast of Strandquist on Wednesday.

Closed Season on Grouse

The season on Ruffed Grouse or Partridge and Quail will be closed in Minnesota this year, according to information sent out last week by W. D. Stewart, head of the game and fish department. This action was taken at the close of a survey made of the state in regards to the birds, and Mr. Stewart said that a closed season now would mean that the birds would be in abundance at a future season.

Died From Accident Injuries

Funeral rites were conducted on Saturday afternoon from the Trinity Lutheran church in Thief River Falls for E. A. Mostue who died in a hospital there on Wednesday night following injuries sustained in an automobile accident a half mile north of town here two weeks ago tonight. He passed away without regaining consciousness, and was at the time of his death 71 years old.

Mr. Mostue was born in 1859 in Hedemarken, Norway, and came to Minnesota with his parents in 1866. In 1898 he moved to Grafton, N. D., where he was married to Regina Arnstad the same year. After that he lived at many places in Dakota and Minnesota, coming to Thief River Falls in 1904.

He studied in several of the big schools and seminaries in Minnesota and was ordained a minister in 1899, but spent his life teaching school. He served as superintendent of Pennington county schools for ten years.

Surviving relatives are Mrs. Mostue, a daughter and four sons, a brother and sister.

If someone visits you, show your appreciation by telling us of it, by mail or otherwise.

CardsWin World's Series

The World's Series baseball came to an end at St. Louis Sat. when the St. Louis Cardinals won the last of the series of seven games and re-captured the World Title bringing it back to the National League and St. Louis after a lean lapse of five years.

The Cards whipped the Philadelphia Athletics 4 to 2 in the final contest giving them four out of the seven games in the series. It sure was a wonderful championship fight all the way thru and closed as the first million dollar baseball show in five years, wiih the total receipts for the seven games totaling the huge sum of $1,030,723.

John Augustine and family returned home last week from a few days visit with relatives in Goodhue county.

20 YEARS AGO

Items Clipped From The Northern Light for the Issue of Oct. 20, 1911.

Martin Widsten, editor of the Warroad Pioneer visited at the home of Nels Engebretson.

Andrew Bjerk threshed out a big crop. He got 50 bushels of Speltz to the acre. Oats went 54; Wheat 21 and Flax 14 bushels to the acre.

Johnny Johnson was over from Langdon, N. D, to take in the market day here.

Holt celebrated a big market day. There was a good crowd in attendance, weather considered, and all were well pleased with the program rendered.

Miss Selma Wegge returned home after a long visit with friends in Crookston and points in North Dakota.

Messrs Carlson, of the Holt Mercantile company were busy the first part of the week loading a car of potatoes for shipment. We understand that they paid a better price than could be obtained from buyers in Thief River Falls. This shows how these progressive business men of Holt get the business and prosper.

A pear-shape pearl of brilliant luster was found a distance above Stillwater by a clam fisher, and sold to a gem buyer in Red Wing for $2,000. The gem weighed 49 grains, and the buyer expects to double his money on the deal.

Band Practice

There will be band practice every Tuesday evening in the Holt school house, until further notice.

Skim-milk as a Protein Feed

Many farmers are using skim-milk as a very successful substitute for linseed meal to supply the protein in the ration. One gallon of skim-milk is equal to one pound of linseed meal and may be fed in that proportion, giving even better results than the meal and also utilizing what might otherwise be a waste product.

The following makes a good balanced ration for a 1000 to 1200 pound cow giving an average flow of milk:

Corn silage	30 lbs.
Prairie hay	10 "
Bran	4 "
Barley	8 "
Oats	3 "
Skim-milk	2 gallons.

Surely Must Have Been Extreme Limit in Cars

Frank B. Curran of the Department of Commerce was talking about his recently completed road survey, which shows that the United States, with 3,016,000 miles of roads, leads the world in road mileage, the world total being only 7,806,000 miles.

"You see some amazing cars on our roads," Mr. Curran said. "Some are amazing for their beauty, and some are like the story.

"'Where did you get that car?' one man asked another on a Georgia road.

"'My cousin gave it to me,' said the other man.

"The first man studied the car for a minute. Then he said:

"'You've been robbed.'"

More and More

Publisher George Doran said in a literary talk:

"Novels get more and more passionate, don't they? A novel like 'Three Weeks' was considered terrific when it came out, but the girl of today would consider 'Three Weeks' dull.

"A class of coeds were asked to make out a list of subjects that they'd like to write essays on. One girl began a list with:

"'My Ideal Man,' 'A Divine Hour,' 'Moonlight Love,' 'One Hour of Love,' 'Desert Love,' 'Life's Happiest Hour.' Then she broke off.

"'I'm not satisfied with this list,' she said. 'It seems so darn practical.'"

WHAT many people call indigestion very often means excess acid in the stomach. The stomach nerves have been over-stimulated, and food sours. The corrective is an alkali, which neutralizes the acids instantly. And the best alkali known to medical science is Phillips Milk of Magnesia.

One spoonful of this harmless, tasteless alkali in water neutralizes instantly many times that much acid, and the symptoms disappear at once. You will never use crude methods when once you learn the efficiency of this. Go get a small bottle to try.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips Milk of Magnesia prescribed by physicians for 50 years in correcting excess acids. 25c and 50c a bottle—any drugstore.

Cities Use Radio in War on Crime

Police Broadcasting Stations Prove Effective.

Washington.—A rapidly increasing use of radio in the nation-wide battle against crime and racketeering is shown by records of the radio commission. These disclose that in the short space of three years twenty large cities and several smaller ones have installed special police broadcasting stations and equipped patrolmen on duty with apparatus enabling them to receive orders from headquarters within a few moments.

The proved value of the radio in facilitating rapid communication and in many cases assisting in the capture of murderers and other criminals whole activities cost the nation hundreds of millions of dollars annually, has prompted thirty additional cities to make preparation for joining in the radio war against crime. Of this latter group, twenty-two hold construction permits for the establishment of radio stations and communication systems.

Finally realizing the importance of drafting the radio for service in the crime war, the radio commission has set aside eight channels especially for police work. The bands are all within a few meters of each other and lie below normal broadcasting channels. In some quarters it is predicted that ultimately so many cities will utilize the radio for police work that it will be possible to evolve a nation-wide network for the broadcasting of police alarms.

The success achieved by police in Chicago and Detroit was largely responsible for the rapidly growing popularity of police broadcasting systems. As far back as 1928 Detroit inaugurated its first broadcasting system, one of the first big ones in the country. To date, Detroit officials credit more than 800 arrests solely to the speed with which radio facilitated broadcasting criminal reports to officers stationed throughout the city and outlying districts.

Chicago's first experiments, initiated by WGN, a newspaper station, were so successful that that city now has three stations.

Cities now covered by police radio stations are Pasadena, Calif., Washington, Chicago, Louisville, Detroit, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Toledo, Rochester, Omaha, Kansas City, Kan., San Francisco, Pittsburgh, Atlanta, Indianapolis, Memphis, St. Louis, Passaic, N. J., Dallas, Texas, Miami, Fla., Flint, Mich., Cincinnati, West Reading, Pa., Philadelphia, and Buffalo.

One of the most extensive police radio installations is that inaugurated by the state police of Michigan last winter. After a strenuous fight a 5,000-watt transmitter was opened at Lansing last November. All state troopers' headquarters and cars were equipped with apparatus and a signaling system was set in operation.

NEW HEAD OF FIDAC

Edward L. White of New Haven, Conn., is the new president of "Fidac," the interallied veterans' federation of which the American Legion is the member society in the United States. Mr. White was a national vice commander of the American Legion in 1928, and is the second American named to head the Fidac. He is a graduate of Yale and served as an officer in the ordnance department during the war.

Wild Life Is Driven Into Open by Drought

Bakersville, Calif.—A shortage of grubs and other succulent dainties to be found under bowlders and logs, plus general poor mountain foraging, has caused bears to invade the lowlands, stockmen from the Kernville district complain.

The cattlemen say the bears have raided many pigpens and a number of unoccupied summer cabins.

From Wasco, 25 miles northeast, come reports that coyotes have become so bold as to remain in the open in the daytime and on several occasions have tried to fraternize with dogs.

Several coveys of quail have forsaken the mountains for the outlying districts of Bakerfield, residents have reported, and at Wasco a covey of Japanese pheasants has taken possession of a eucalyptus grove, where food and water is plentiful.

Farmer Moves Barn 30 Miles to New Site

Berwick, Pa.—Neighbors of G. A. Hilley, farmer at Raven Creek, assisted him in moving a barn 30 miles to a new location.

Hilley's own barn was destroyed by fire. He purchased a barn on the Creasy farm at Miffinville, 30 miles away. Eighteen of his neighbors joined him in dismantling the Creasy barn, transporting it to the Hilley farm and re-erecting it.

Seven trucks were used in transporting the structure.

Sultan of Sulu Sits as Filipino Senator

Fez Only Distinguishing Mark of Former Ruler.

Manila, P. I.—A visitor to the Philippine senate these days is quick to mark one member from the rest by a single distinguishing mark—a blue fez.

Otherwise he appears to the casual observer little different from the other senators. He is a sturdy-looking man of sixty-four, who goes about very much as if he knows his business.

This man is Sultan Jamalul Kiram II of Sulu, senator of the Twelfth district, who was a civil ruler in his own right until 1915, when he abdicated, to end a dynasty which existed for more than 500 years.

Gov.-Gen. Dwight F. Davis has the privilege of appointing several members of the legislature from regions and provinces where conditions make it difficult to hold elections, and the governor chose the sultan as a senator from Mohammedan Sulu.

The senator is reputed to have had more than 1,000 wives, but he has no children. Also, he is the last in the line of famous sultans whose history was interwoven for centuries in the colorful Moro history of the southern islands.

As a boy Jamalul was a prince, and his elder brother, Badaruddin, was sultan. The latter died in 1882 and Jamalul sought the succession, aided by his mother. A long conflict developed, however, and the Spanish government intruded and named Datu Harun al Raschid of Palawan as sultan of Sulu. He ruled until 1894, but supporters of Jamalul grew so strong that Harun finally returned to Palawan. Meanwhile Jamalul had been a fugitive, but he finally was formally recognized as the sultan in 1894.

In 1915 he abdicated and accepted American sovereignty without reservation, although he continued to hold an extremely important place among his people. Now he has taken another step and become a cog in a democratic government far removed from the traditions of his family.

Spears Big Salmon in Old Indian Style

Biddeford, Maine.—A quaint old Indian custom has been revived here by Arthur Lambert, a millworker. Standing on the edge of a rockbound pool in the Saco river, he hurled a home-made spear into a 14-pound salmon, the biggest taken from the river this season.

Pacific Flyers Found on an Island

St. Paul—The first barge of coal landed at the new municipal barge terminal here. Federal, state and city officials and business men of the northwest took part in the greeting of the tow.

Minneapolis—Radio station WCCO has just been authorized by the Federal Radio Commission to operate with a power of 50,000 watts. This will place the station on a par with the largest broadcasting stations in the country.

Danvers—Six buildings in the business district were destroyed by fire when a shortage of water prevented firemen from checking the blaze. Apparatus from Benson and Halloway responded to a call for aid in battling the flames. Loss is estimated at $75,000.

Benson—George C. Beckwith, president of the radio distributing firm in Minneapolis that bears his name, was killed accidently while hunting ducks a short distance from here. He tripped and fell on the muzzle and the entire load ripped through his abdomen.

Virginia—Protesting the grand juries in St. Louis county are partial in their findings to interests of large mining companies and bent only on indicting officials unfriendly to mining interests, the county organization of the farmer-labor party passed a resolution asking an investigation.

Dodge Center—Warnings to farmers to watch for symptoms of hog cholera have been issued by the county agent to the southern tier of Dodge County townships. He also asks them to report immediately all suspected cases. A similar warning is being sent to farmers in southeastern Steele county.

Fort Snelling—Three sodiers were killed by a drunken driver on the reservation here. They are: Private W. J. Dodson, Belle Plaine, Kans.; W. J. Rasmussen, Denmark and T. E. Russell of Spring Valley, Minnesota. The driver was captured after running into a detail of ten soldiers and was arrested. Two more men are not expected to live. The driver will be tried by the government on a charge of involuntary manslaughter, which carries a penalty of 20 years.

Faribault—Protesting against high taxation in the county, between 300 and 400 taxpayers of Rice county conducted a mass meeting here and formed the Rice County Taxpayers league. John E. Linster of Northfield was chosen president.

Minneapolis—Local navy reservists and navy veterans will participate in observance of annual Navy Day on October 27. Navy Day is observed on former President Theodore Roosevelt's birthday anniversary, and is sponsored by the Navy League of the United States

45,000,000 Visit Parks

The state parks of the country, now numbering more than 300, were by no means idle acres last year. Figures gathered by the National Park service indicate that there were 45,000,000 visitors in the reservations last year, making an average of 15,000 per park. The parks, incidentally, averaged 1,000 acres each although naturally many were much larger and many much smaller.

BOWELS need watching

Let Dr. Caldwell help whenever your child is feverish or upset; or has caught cold.

His simple prescription will make that bilious, headachy, cross boy or girl comfortable, happy, well in just a few hours. It soon restores the bowels to healthy regularity. It helps "break-up" a cold by keeping the bowels free from all that sickening mucus waste.

You have a famous doctor's word for this laxative. Dr. Caldwell's record of having attended over 3500 births without loss of one mother or baby is believed unique in American medical history.

Get a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin from your drugstore and have it ready. Then you won't have to worry when any member of your family is headachy, bilious, gassy or constipated. Syrup Pepsin is good for all ages. It sweetens the bowels; increases appetite—makes digestion more complete.

RESTFUL SLEEP for FRETFUL, FEVERISH CHILD

—With Castoria's regulation

When your child tosses and cries out in his sleep, it means he is not comfortable. Very often the trouble is that poisonous waste matter is not being carried off as it should be. Bowels need help—mild, gentle help—but effective. Just the kind Castoria gives. Castoria is a pure vegetable preparation made specially for children's ailments. It contains no harsh, harmful drugs, no narcotics. Don't let your child's rest—and your own—be interrupted. A prompt dose of Castoria will urge stubborn little bowels to act. Then relaxed comfort and restful sleep! Genuine Castoria always has the name:

Mining in New York

New York is not usually considered a mining state, largely because it does not contain any gold or silver, yet its sub-surface deposits yield returns greater than those of many states with popular reputations for their mineral resources, according to a recent publication of the New York State museum. More than thirty substances are mined in the state, including iron, zinc, pyrite, salt, calcium sulphate, stone and clay.

You Can Stop that Rheumatic Pain

The constant nerve-wracking pain that spells rheumatism or neuritis can be relieved, often stopped entirely. The new treatment which gives quick results where old methods have failed calls for two or three daily applications of B. & M., The Penetrating Germicide. Used externally, this preparation seldom fails to stop the intense pain in a few hours. Also, where the trouble is caused by germ infection, the B. & M. treatment will destroy the germs, making it possible for Nature to restore normal conditions. Your druggist should be able to supply B. & M. If not, send us his name and $1.25 for a full-size bottle. Or ask for free booklet. F. E. Rollins Co., 53 Beverly St., Boston, Mass. (Adv.)

A CANDLE IN THE WILDERNESS

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

by IRVING BACHELLER

—25—

So this meeting of lovers came to its end. Preceded by the dignified halberdier, Peggy walked with the governor to his house, where she spent the night. They were an hour by the fireside discussing the strange eventful story with details known only to them and laying their plans. The governor wrote a note to Porman. The maid, who brought her night clothes and helped her to bed, was told to awake her at seven and bring her sop and beer. So Peggy was up betimes and on her way to the house of Rev. Philander Porman. She had worked with him in the new school for the children of the poor. He was a learned man of rare insight, who was fond of Peggy and knew of her devotion to Robert. He had given her friendly counsel. Lately he had told her of knowing a new witness in the famous adultery case who would, he felt sure, change the complexion of the whole matter. He had been alone by the bedside of Mabel Hartley when she died and had taken her last confession. Therein the name of the witness was disclosed. Peggy was the only person who had shared his confidence in this matter. Peggy found him in his study and was heartily welcomed. She told Porman of the arrival of Robert and of his great peril from hasty action. She delivered the note from Governor Vane.

"But now the deputies have to be reckoned with," said Porman. "They like to curb the severity of the magistrates."

"Still Robert is a hated aristocrat. I hope to engage their sympathy. But I dare not go to court without the help you can give me."

"Do you wish me to go to the witness chair?"

"Not yet. But I would like a written statement, signed by you, regarding the new witness—something that will give strong support to my plea for the delay we need to find him and bring him into court. Do you know where he is?"

"Yes, and I think that we could bring him here within a week. I shall need a trusty messenger."

"You shall have Amos Todkill."

"Send him to me," said Porman as he sat down at his desk and began to write.

Soon he read to Peggy the letter which he had addressed to the magistrates, deputies and assistants of the court of the colony of Massachusetts Bay. It was an admirable letter of a temperate and convincing tone. The girl was pleased with it. She went to the inn to find Amos Todkill. They told her that he had gone to the prison. She found him sitting alone on the prison steps, his head resting on his hands. He arose and came to her with a sad look in his face.

"Oh, miss! I'm all wilted down like an empty sack throwed on the ground," he said sorrowfully.

"Cheer up, man," said Peggy. "They cannot hang him. I am going to defend him with good evidence."

Amos bowed, his hat in his hand, and then looked at her face: "The candle o' the Lord is in yer soul," he said. "I can see the shine o' it in yer eyes. I reckon that's why Robert loves ye so."

"How do you know that he loves me?" Peggy asked.

"Good Lord o' mercy, gal! If he hadn't had hold o' that little hand o' yours do ye think he could 'a' hopped into hell and clim' out ag'in? Every day he were thinkin' o' you. Ye know when a man is sick and sufferin' it's a right smart help for his mind to have a cud like that to chaw on."

"Thanks, Amos! I wouldn't have missed hearing that. I have come to tell you that I need your help. Go to Rev. Philander Porman, who lives in Church lane. He will send you to find a new witness for Robert. Bring him to me as soon as you can. Here is money."

She gave him a generous supply of funds and hurried to the house of the young governor, who was getting ready to go to court. His six halberdiers who accompanied him to court and to church were waiting at the door. She left her horse with a groom, changed her garments and set out for the house of justice not less worried than the prisoner himself. It seemed to the girl that the angel of death was courting her, hovering above her head. "If I fail," she said to herself, "my life will be no more to me than a broken straw."

Many people were on their way to the courthouse. When she arrived there its seats were filled and the area behind them was crowded. She entered the space near the throne of justice reserved for prisoners, officers of the court and counsel. She sat down. The grave-faced magistrates, in black robes and broad white collars, entered, followed by the assistants and deputies. Two constables came with the prisoner. The court was called to order. Robert Heathers was arraigned and asked to plead. He declared that he was not guilty.

Governor Vane said: "Before we proceed with this trial there is one here who has asked for the privilege of addressing the court and presenting a communication relating to important evidence lately discovered bearing on the point at issue. We will now give our attention to Miss Weld."

Peggy Weld arose and bowed. She was dressed in sober black with a white collar and snowy lace beneath her throat and on her wrists. The costume was cunningly chosen. It was the right accessory for her color and her beauty and the singular charm of her manner. In a moment all those stern-faced men were deeply interested. With a modest bearing and a voice filled with the music of a deep sincerity she won their sympathy. What she said is in the records of the court:

"Gentlemen, not long ago we were all impressed by the eloquent words of our governor when he spoke of the peril of haste in seeking justice, when he told how our fathers had been wronged by hasty judgments inspired by bitter feeling and carried out with an imperfect knowledge of the truth. Remembering those words I now ask you for a brief delay in these proceedings. I ask it not because the prisoner is my lover, not because his life is dearer to me even than my own, but because I have discovered new evidence which may save you from an error the consequence of which, in ruined lives and afflicted consciences, you could never repair. I have the honor of bringing to your minds a communication from one whom you all know and respect—Rev. Philander Porman."

She read the letter:

"'To the magistrates, assistants and deputies of the General court, Gentlemen: I had not thought that it would ever be necessary for me to address you as I now do. But the time has come when I must tell you that I know who was guilty of adultery with Mabel Hartley on the night of October twelfth. He is not either Robert Heathers or the beloved William Heydon. He is quite another individual. I know a witness to his misbehavior who can, I hope, be brought here within a week or so.

"'With deep respect I am
"'Your obedient servant,
"'Philander Porman.'"

Peggy sat down. Her plea for time was granted. There was a great stir in the crowd as the people began to leave their seats. The governor beckoned her to the bench and whispered: "Well done." John Winthrop shook her hand and the stern Dudley smiled as he looked down upon her.

This modest maiden had become a toast and a theme in the colony.

CHAPTER XIV

William Returns From the War and Is Praised for Heroic Conduct

The Pequot Indians had fallen on the English settlers in Connecticut and slain men and women as they worked in the fields. John Tilly had been ambushed and slain on the fresh water river. A whole family in that valley had been massacred. It all came of an ancient grievance when Thomas Hunt, an irresponsible man, seized twenty-seven inoffensive Pequots in 1614 and took them away in the hold of his ship and sold them as slaves. It was a grievance against the white man. The colony had given them no cause of ill will. The resentment of the red outlaws grew hot again when they saw white settlers coming near, to lands duly purchased. These red men had kept aloof in their western strongholds and had been a terror to the friendly tribes, so that they never dared to look a Pequot in the face.

The battles at their well-built fort on Mystic river, in the swamp and at the last stronghold of the tribe on a hilltop above the Pequot river, were a stern lesson to the wild men of the forest. No other was needed for nearly half a century. It was significant that some five hundred friendly Indians in the attacking force cherished the notion that their white comrades would not dare to face the terrible Pequots. These red recruits in the small colonial army were so touched with fear that they fled in disorder at the first outcry of "Owanux!" from the Pequot warriors. The white men marched up to their biggest stronghold, drew away their brush barriers, entered it and slew between six and seven hundred of these torturers and murderers and burned their wigwams. It was swiftly done. The survivors scattered. They carried to their brothers of the wilderness a warning that the palefaced people had the voice of thunder, the hand of lightning and a heart as fearless as the great father of the bears and that they came like the tumbling river in the west.

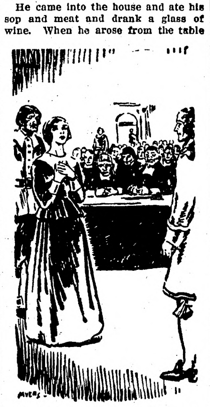
Of the heroic conduct of William Heydon one may read in Mason's own account of the campaign, how he cut the bowstring of a savage aiming at his commander from a point so close that the arrow would no doubt have done serious damage. It was fighting hand to hand and face to face. His sword flashed at Mason's side as swift as a cat's foot and many fell before it. The burning wigwams increased the panic of the Indians. Their palisaded two acres were soon wet with their blood. The work was finished by pistol and musket fire. It was a decisive battle between sorcery and industry, between civilization and savagery.

The victorious company returned to Boston three days after Peggy Weld had changed the plans of the general court. In his report to the governor Captain Mason declared that his life had been saved by William Heydon who "from the beginning to the end of the campaign had behaved in the fashion of a hero." The new-won fame of the young man quickly spread from house to house. A committee of the leading citizens went to his home to express their appreciation. It did not find him. Margaret Hooper reported that he had gone to the prison to see his friend Robert Heathers.

It is only known that the young men spent an hour together in the room where Peggy had sat with Robert. Dusk was falling and the beacons were aglow when William came away and walked to his home. His supper was on the table. Margaret Hooper was wont to tell of the kindly tone of his voice and of the smile on his face when he declined to eat and went to his room.

The next morning the sun shone warm and bluebirds were streaking the air with color and with their dulcet phrases. It was the Sabbath day. At nine Margaret heard William stirring and began to get his sop and meat ready. He came out by and by carefully dressed. He went to his stable.

He came into the house and ate his sop and meat and drank a glass of wine. When he arose from the table he said: "Margaret, make haste and put away the dishes. We will go to the church together."



What She Said Is in the Records of the Court.

She turned to him with a look of surprise, saying:

"Oh, sir, I am only a poor, homely working woman who spends her time teasing wool by the fireside. You would put the sin of pride in me?"

"Margaret, I shall be proud to walk with you in the heavenly road and to kneel at your side before the people. And I would ever pray for the strength that is in you."

The Church lane at that hour was crowded with rich and poor on their way to the house of God. Many seized the hand of the new-come hero and spoke words of praise unwelcome to his ear. The stern-faced Endicott and Dudley stood by the great doors waiting for the governor. They smiled upon the young man and touched his shoulder and invoked the blessing of God upon him.

"Thank you. I am in sore need of it," he answered.

Getting Deaf

A certain well-known local hypochrondriac has a new fear—that is getting hard of hearing. His doctor assures him it isn't so, but he worries constantly about the possibility of becoming deaf.

His complex took the form of announcing to his office mates that he was going to buy some sort of an earphone, to see if that aided him. Consequently his colleagues were ready for him when he appeared with it next day, and whispered every word they addressed to him or to anyone in his presence.

Now he's telling his doctor that the good man doesn't know what he's talking about. Mean? Maybe—but have you ever lived with a hypo-chrondriac?—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Retouched

Mary Jane's aunt noticed the picture of a little girl on the youngster's desk. It so happened that Mary Jane had quarreled with the little girl a short time before.

"What a pretty little girl!" exclaimed the aunt. "Your little friend is very pretty."

"Oh, she isn't really pretty," corrected Mary Jane. "That picture has just been retouched!"

Siam's Monarch Credits Progress to Football

The king of Siam, now in this country for an operation on his eyes, is noted or rather will be in history, for the great progress his country has made under his rule. When asked by a reporter what he considered to be the greatest factor in this remarkable progress, he made the astounding answer.—"Football."

"No, I do not jest. You know I was educated in England and learned the game. I introduced it in Siam and it aroused the spirit of competition in a race which has idled along in contented apathy for centuries.

"The army and navy played first. We had few men in either, for Siamese are not eager to be warriors. But soon after football came in, we had so many recruits that now our ranks are overflowing. Football awakened the nation and this wakefulness spread to every line of commercial and social endeavor. It has even taught a barefooted nation to wear shoes."

Games Popular Today Known Centuries Ago

The fact that some of our modern games are very old was shown recently when the University of Pennsylvania museum acquired a die, dating from about 2750 B. C., which may have been one of a pair used in backgammon. The backgammon of ancient days was played on a tablet ruled with straight lines. Instead of the colored triangles painted on the modern board, which is said to date from about the Tenth century. But the principle on which it was played has been preserved, and, like a number of other modern games, backgammon's ancient origin is still apparent.

The Greeks played a form of backgammon in which the men or counters were moved along a rectangular board known as the "abacus"; the players took turns at throwing dice, and advanced their men according to the numbers they threw. The Romans had a similar game known as "Scripta Duodecim," or twelve lines, which they probably carried over from the Greeks. That backgammon was also known to other peoples of ancient times is shown by a board, discovered at Ur and dating from about 3000 B. C., which is also in the collection of Pennsylvania university. The die recently acquired by the museum was found at Tepe Gawra in Mesopotamia.

Even older than backgammon is the game of dice. Sophocles wrote that dice were invented during the seige of Troy by one Palamedes, a Greek; Herodotus credited the Lydians with the accomplishment; but the discovery of dice in very early oriental tombs indicates that they were probably of Asiatic origin.—New York Times.

Oyster Culture

The sow-and-reap method so common to agriculture is on trial in the oyster industry. An enterprising company operating at Padilla bay on Puget sound will plant seed oysters from Japan about the first of each year and harvest them the following fall. Fifty million oysters are now growing in the Padilla beds and will be ready before long. Care will be taken not to let the oysters reach the gigantic, "beefsteak" size they would if allowed to attain their full growth.

Hottest Part of Day

Is the hottest part of the day the time when the sun is vertically overhead? The strongest rays of the sun occur when the sun is vertically overhead or most nearly so, which is at noon, but the hottest part of the day occurs about 2 p. m. because of the accumulation of heat due to solar radiation throughout the morning hours. —New York Telegram.

A big snappy free-for-all fight took place on the main avenue here Saturday night about ten minutes after the dance closed. As far as we were able to learn the facts as to why it started, was that some boys from a neighboring town came down and looked for trouble with the results that shirts, fists and faces were damaged. The proprietor of the dance place runs it clean and is not to be blamed for this.

Skim-milk as a Protein Feed

Many farmers are using skim-milk as a very successful substitute for linseed meal to supply the protein in the ration. One gallon of skim-milk is equal to one pound of linseed meal and may be fed in that proportion, giving even better results than the meal and also utilizing what might otherwise be a waste product.

The following makes a good balanced ration for a 1000 to 1200 pound cow giving an average flow of milk:

Corn silage	30 lbs.
Prairie hay	10 "
Bran	4 "
Barley	3 "
Oats	3 "
Skim-milk	2 gallons.

The Reason for Last Fall's Warm Weather

Several people commenting of the fine weather we are having now, say that we had snow at this time last year. We can not find anything in our files for last October about this, and believe that the snow was kept off by the heat of the big election that was to be held in November.

C. L. Sandberg and family and Mrs. A. E. Anderson visited with relatives at St. Hilaire on Sunday.

If someone visits you, show your appreciation by telling us of it, by mail or otherwise.

We always appreciate your sending in news items.

Are you too old for your job?

INTO the life of every one comes a time when we notice the years slipping by, and we see people we considered youngsters catching up to us in business. This feeling usually goes hand in hand with irritability. Tiredness and lack of "pep" are also symptoms.

When you get that feeling, take stock of yourself. You will probably find that the old job is getting you. You need a change.

If you can't afford to go away, take the finest of all remedies for that "fagged-out" feeling—Fellows' Syrup.

After a few doses of this perfect tonic, the job will again "look good" to you, and you will greet every morning with a smile.

FELLOWS' SYRUP

Girl Babies of India

Owing to an alarming decrease in the number of female children in the state, the maharaja of Kashmir has offered an acre of land to every father of a new-born baby girl.

He also had pamphlets and posters circulated through the village warning the populace against the evils of infanticide. In years past northern Indian races have made it a practice to destroy female offsprings at birth because they potentially were less valuable as workers than male children.

AFTER 40
bowel trouble

Constipation may very easily become chronic after forty. And any continued constipation at that time of life may bring attacks of piles and a host of other unpleasant disorders.

Watch your bowels at any age. Guard them with particular care after forty. Whenever they need any help, remember a doctor should know what is best for them.

"Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin" is a doctor's prescription for the bowels. Tested by 47 years' practice, it has been found thoroughly effective in relieving constipation and its ills for men, women and children of all ages. It has proven perfectly safe even for babies. Made from fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other harmless ingredients, it cannot gripe; will not sicken you or weaken you; can be used without harm as often as your breath is bad, or when your tongue is coated; whenever a headachy, bilious, gassy condition warns of constipation.

—26—

The governor arrived with his six swordsmen and halberdiers—the one colorful token of pomp in the colony. Peggy Weld stood with Philander Porman a little beyond the entrance.

"We were waiting for a look at you and to tell you of our love," said Porman.

William smiled. He shook their hands, saying to Peggy:

"You great lawyer! Why are you so pale and anxious? Be of good cheer."

They went to their seats. In a moment or so the meeting house was filled. Even the stairways were crowded with the young. The prisoners filed in, led by the ponderous John Samp, with sword and pistol hanging from his belt. They were followed by three armed constables. All heads were turned to look at the children of Satan, among whom was Robert Heathers with the hempen noose around his neck.

"Why has that humiliation been put upon him?" William asked himself as he looked.

A like query was in the minds of many. Was it a warning to the evil-minded—a token of the dreadful punishment he was soon to suffer? The truth is the noose was put on Robert's neck that morning in compliance with a special order from the governor.

Now, in front of the pulpit, wherein sat the minister, was a platform for elders and, a little lower, one for the deacons of the parish. There was no musical instrument. The presenter arose, blew on a little box of wood, with a movable slide, to get his pitch and led the congregation in the opening hymn.

Doctor Cotton said in the first prayer: "When the devil maketh a man to boil against his brother and urgeth that he be hardly treated I pray that the man may consider himself and say: 'I have offended God more than this poor sinner hath offended me.'"

No doubt the heart of the good doctor was touched by the plight of the young man who had been his friend.

Rev. John Wilson asked those who wished to be prayed for to arise and present their bills.

William Heydon arose and walked to the side of his friend who sat at the end of the prisoner's pew next to the aisle. The stage had been carefully set for this dramatic moment by the governor.

William took the hempen noose from Robert's neck and put it on his own.

"This is my confession," he said. "Before this day I should have made it. Long have I walked among you with this burden on me waiting for the chance to prove my courage and my manhood, for I could not bear to die unregretted and a coward. Now I stand here covered with my shame. When you pray for me pray also for the soul of her who shared my sin. To justify my act in your hearing I have not the will to try. I set myself before another judgment seat and of its finding I have no fear. The man whose shame and burden I now take upon me ran away in the hope that by so doing he could save my life. He has suffered much for his love of me. Of that I would not fail to tell you. Only one fear is in my heart—that my small service to the public and my many friends may embarrass the court. I have suffered the torment of the damned. My hope, my pride, my cherished plans have been swept away. I stand before you stripped and naked. I shall go hence to my home and there await your further wishes. I no longer fear you. If you would tighten this noose upon my neck until my life is ended you will only grieve my friends—not me."

He went to his seat. It was a tense moment. A little groan came from the lips of Margaret Hooper. Tears were flowing down her cheeks. She could fathom the depth of his words as could no other. The young man bent his head and whispered in her ear. A deep, electric silence had fallen upon the crowd emphasized by little signs of emotion. The hand of God was being laid on the souls of the people.

Rev. Philander Porman arose and went to William. He took the noose from his neck. These were his words: "I have said to the magistrates and I say again that the William Heydon who has spoken to you, with the grace of God in his heart, is not the man who broke a law of the court but one who has risen through suffering to a manhood noble and beloved, the like of which is not in this colony. Heydon the sinner has already suffered the pain of death. He is not here. Only the name remains—a thing without substance. If there be one among you who dares to think that he is as free of sin as this young friend of mine let him hurl the first stone, but I warn him that his conceit shall not pass unnoticed."

The prayer, the sermon followed, but for once not many could have told what was said in them. The psalm singing and the benediction! There were many benedictions that morning as the people crowded around William and Robert and shook their hands.

"It was a sight as comely as the curtains of Solomon," said Margaret Hooper. "Dear son, the grace o' God was poured upon your face."

No stone was hurled then or later. Again free, the young men walked to their home with Margaret and Peggy and Porman. The sun shone and song sparrows and bluebirds were singing on either side of them as they walked and talked together.

They found Amos Todkill waiting on the small veranda.

"I tried to travel by the light o' the moon," he said to Porman. "I were lost and foundered in the darkness. So they got by me on the path."

His words had reference to William and his returning company.

"Faithful soul!" Peggy exclaimed. "It does not matter. Robert is free."

Amos threw his hat high above his head and lifted his right foot and shook it vigorously.

"You are to go out to my house tomorrow prepared to stay," said Peggy. "I need your help there. It may be that Robert will come to see us now and then."

"I think that it is very likely," said Robert with a smile.

"But you are not to come until Thursday," said Peggy. "Then we shall be ready for you."

For a time the young men were engaged with their business affairs. On Thursday they went out to Moondawn.

"It is very beautiful," said Robert. "I should love to live here."

"Well, I built it hoping that you would," she answered with a smile.

He kissed her lips and said as he looked down into her eyes:

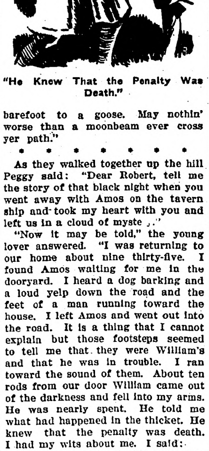
"I now ask you to marry me. It's the first chance I've had."

She answered with a laugh: "Come to the house and I will perform my last act as your lawyer. I will collect my fee. Rev. Mr. Porman is there and William and Amos Todkill. In business I neglect no detail."

Again he kissed her.

Amos came upon them suddenly while they were in this tender attitude.

"Don't mind me," he said. "This is as nat'ral for the young as goin' barefoot to a goose. May nothin' worse than a moonbeam ever cross yer path."



"He Knew That the Penalty Was Death."

* * * * * * *

As they walked together up the hill Peggy said: "Dear Robert, tell me the story of that black night when you went away with Amos on the tavern ship and took my heart with you and left us in a cloud of mystery."

"Now it may be told," the young lover answered. "I was returning to our home about nine thirty-five. I found Amos waiting for me in the dooryard. I heard a dog barking and a loud yelp down the road and the feet of a man running toward the house. I left Amos and went out into the road. It is a thing that I cannot explain but those footsteps seemed to tell me that they were William's and that he was in trouble. I ran toward the sound of them. About ten rods from our door William came out of the darkness and fell into my arms. He was nearly spent. He told me what had happened in the thicket. He knew that the penalty was death. I had my wits about me. I said:

"'It was dark in the thicket. The constable could not tell whether it was you or I. That little woman will not betray you. I will run away with Amos. They'll be sure to think that I am the guilty man. You go up now to the camp and tell Beggs to take charge of the men in the morning.'

"He set out for the camp. I told Amos that I had to get away from there and quickly. He knew that the tavern ship was going out at midnight. Its captain had been trying to hire him. I had to go or be a witness against my friend. I was in eager haste. I got my wallet and gun and we set out for the shore where Amos had a boat house and a canoe. We reached the tavern ship in good time. When news came to the ship that William was to be tried for his life I did what I could to turn suspicion upon myself and that was a help to my friend as time went on.

"One thing was not in my reckoning. Mabel Hartley revealed the identity of her companion though she tried later to take it back. It is likely that for some time she and William had been well acquainted, but all this is to be forgotten. She was fair—very fair to look upon and one cannot help being human even in America."

"Be of good cheer," said Peggy with a smile. "I shall try to keep you out of danger."

"Often I wonder at what has come to pass in the soul of my friend," the young lover remarked. "I reckon a man is like a tree. If he is well rooted, strength, from the source of all power, comes into him and he grows. But a man can make his own soil and sunlight so that there is a kind of magic in his growth."

Peggy answered: "Somehow William got in touch with that power which hung the earth upon nothing and keeps it spinning in the sky. So I wonder not that we have seen a miracle."

Near the end of his term Governor Vane was voted down because of his liberal views. He returned to England and became one of the great figures in its history—a member of parliament in 1640; treasurer of the navy when Blake won his victories; a member of the Long parliament wherein he led the opposition to the royalist party and was largely responsible for the trial and execution of the earl of Strafford. He went to Scotland as a commissioner to negotiate an alliance. Through his persuasion the Solemn League and Covenant was adopted. He was on all commissions treating with the king. He led the minority. In 1649 he had the control of the navy and of all foreign wars. In 1653 he opposed Cromwell's dissolution of parliament by force and became his enemy. After Cromwell's death he led the Republican party. Then the Restoration and the famous letter of Charles II in which he wrote to his counselors: "He (Vane) is too dangerous a man to let live if we can honestly put him out of the way." Vane was tried for treason and, although innocent, was denied the benefit of counsel or a day's delay to secure witnesses. He went to the block and in his last words he sounded the keynote of the Puritan character:

"I can die, but I cannot violate my conscience."

William Heydon, a wealthy planter and shipbuilder in America and quietly influential in its liberal party, was in England at that time. He was among the many friends of Sir Harry Vane who went to speak a friendly word to him and take a last look at his beloved face. William was then forty-eight years old. He had never married. A modest, unpretentious citizen rarely seen and never heard in public assemblies it is nevertheless true that for many years the rulers of the colony were named by the master of Heydon hall. It was his friend Richard Bellingham, twice governor, who late in 1661 sent him cheering news from England.

"I have seen Bessie Brade (he wrote). She is the victim of a father's stubborn pride. Like you, she is living with a memory. I learn that she wrote to you long ago. I wonder if the letter ever came to your hand. Probably not. Then a friend of her father coming over reported that you were soon to marry. Discouraged by this false report she engaged herself to a son of the second earl of Warwick who before their wedding was killed in a battle at sea. She loves you. In the last year her father has passed away. You are still in the full strength of your manhood. You owe it to yourself and to her to go to England and there amend the remarkable story of your life and hers. She has suffered not less than you but through it all she has kept her beauty."

So it happened that William Heydon took a ship for England. In the crowd at Vane's funeral he met the Lady Bess. He took her hand.

"The glory of youth is gone but still you are beautiful," he said.

"If so it is because I have had a memory and a hope," she answered.

She took his arm and they walked away together.

[THE END.]

Boxing the Compass

To box the compass means, in nautical language, to recite in consecutive order the points of the mariner's compass. The points from north to east are as follows: North, north one-half east, north by east, north by east one-half east, north north east, north north one-half east, north east by north, north east one-half north, north east, north east by one-half east, north east by east, north east by east one-half east, east north east, east north east one-half east, east by north, east one-half north, east.

"SICK HEADACHE?"

IT is not necessary to give-in to headaches. It is just a bit old-fashioned! The modern woman who feels a headache coming on at any time, takes some tablets of Bayer Aspirin and heads it off.

Keep Bayer Aspirin handy, and keep your engagements. Headaches, systemic pains, come at inconvenient times. So do colds. You can end them before they're fairly started if you'll only remember this handy, harmless form of relief. Carry it in your purse and insure your comfort while shopping; your evening's pleasure at the theatre. Those little nagging aches that bring a case of "nerves" by day are ended in a jiffy. Pains that once kept people home are forgotten half an hour after taking Bayer Aspirin! You'll find these tablets always help. If you get real aspirin, you'll get real relief. In every package of genuine Bayer tablets are proven directions which cover headaches, colds, sore throat, toothache, neuralgia, neuritis, sciatica, rheumatism, etc.

The tablets stamped Bayer won't fail you, and can't harm you. They don't depress the heart. They don't upset the stomach. So take them whenever you need them, and take enough to end the pain.

How Lindbergh's Father Found "Man" in His Son

Charles A. Lindbergh's father discovered "the man" in his son when they went fishing for the first time, according to the story of "The Lindberghs" in McCall's Magazine. Charles was twelve years old.

They started from Lake Itasca and for two weeks were alone on the river and lakes in northern Minnesota. They were two men who cooked their meals together over a fire in the open and slept out. When they returned Congressman Lindbergh said:

"That trip with Charles was one of the happiest times in my whole life. I learned to know my boy in those two weeks as I had never known him before. I found the man in him. He has good stuff and will stick. He stood up under the discomforts of that trip as I never expected he would. A good experience, that was, for both of us."

Guardian Angel on Job

At Utica, N. Y., Charles Merritt received only a minor scratch when his automobile struck a dog, rolled over four times, smashed a water hydrant, crashed into a telephone pole, and tore down 25 feet of fence. The automobile was wrecked completely.

Nothing has ever been done to improve prunes and they call this an age of progress.

This Woman Lost 64 Pounds of Fat

Mrs. H. Price of Woodside, L. I., writes: "A year ago I weighed 190 lbs. I started to take Kruschen and now I weigh 126 and never felt better in my life and what's more, I look more like 20 yrs. old than the mother of 2 children, one 19 and the other 18. Every one of my friends say it's marvelous the way I reduced."

To lose fat with speed take a half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—don't miss a morning—an 85 cent bottle lasts 4 weeks—get it at any drug store in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back.

Works Through the Blood

In the light of modern medical knowledge, it is apparent that the weapons through which nature works are humoral—that is to say, that her messages are transmitted through the blood.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Reduce the Acid

SICK stomachs, sour stomachs and indigestion usually mean excess acid. The stomach nerves are over-stimulated.

Too much acid makes the stomach and intestines sour. Alkali kills acid instantly. The best form is Phillips' Milk of Magnesia, because one harmless dose neutralizes many times its volume in acid. For 50 years the standard with physicians everywhere.

Take a spoonful in water and your unhappy condition will probably end in five minutes. Then you will always know what to do. Crude and harmful methods will never appeal to you. Go, prove this for your own sake. It may save a great many disagreeable hours.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia prescribed by physicians in correcting excess acids.

A Big Loss

Forgotten HEROES

ELMO SCOTT WATSON

"The Salt Water Lexington"

EVERY American knows the story of what took place at Lexington, Mass., on April 19, 1775, where "the British regulars fired and fled." But how many of them know the story of "the salt water Lexington?"

On June 17, 1772, the armed British schooner Gaspe, which was patrolling the coast of Rhode Island to enforce the trade and navigation acts, so hateful to the American colonists, attempted to stop the Providence packet, Hannah, commanded by Captain Linzee, and chased the colonial vessel into her home port where the British man-of-war went aground on a sandbar. Lieut. William Duddingstone, commander of the Gaspe, had made himself very offensive in his attitude toward the coasting vessels. So when Linzee brought the news of his plight to Providence the people there resolved to make the most of their chance.

That evening 64 picked men, all disguised as Indians, set out in eight long boats under the leadership of Abraham Whipple, and arrived in sight of the stranded Gaspe about two o'clock in the morning. There were few firearms in the boats but every man was well supplied with round paving stones for weapons and when a British sentinel challenged them, their reply was a hail of stones which sent him tumbling hastily below deck.

As the boats closed in on the ship, their crews swarmed over the side and quickly beat down any resistance offered by the sailors of the Gaspe. Then hastily setting fire to the ship, they returned to their boats with their captives and pulled away, but stayed within sight until dawn when the schooner blew up. Then they rowed back to Providence with the tide, released their prisoners and scattered to their homes. The British authorities were furious when they heard of this affair and offered a reward of a thousand pounds for the leader of the expedition and five hundred pounds and a free pardon for any member of it who would turn informers.

But although a "commission of inquiry" was busy for six months investigating the affair, not a single arrest of the "Indians" who had committed this outrage was ever made. And within the next year another party of "Indians" had swooped down upon the tea-ship, Dartmouth, in Boston harbor and there held a "tea party" which has been forever since famous.

Two years later the Continental congress established the first American navy and one of the four captain appointed to command a ship was Capt. Abraham Whipple, leader of the paving stone fighters at the "salt water Lexington."

The Earliest Revolutionist

ALL honor to the heroes of '76, who brought about the Revolution, fought in it and won American freedom, but don't forget the earlier revolutionists who paved the way for them. One of them died on the gallows and his death there, in the words of a recent historian, "was the primordial germ of the American revolt. It antedated Lexington by 85 years, but was in a way, remote but certain, its forebear."

Jacob Leisler was his name. He was a Dutchman who lived in New York in the last part of the Seventeenth century. When James II was deposed as king of England, New York which had been ruled by an absentee ruler, the Duke of York, brother of the king, was without a governor. So the burghers met and appointed a committee of safety (since war with France was in the offing) and chose Leisler to be captain of the fort. Later it authorized him to act as governor until a new one should arrive and although he filled the office well and was recognized as governor by the other colonies, the aristocrats of New York (the English officers and their circle) were bitterly hostile to him.

In 1689 the new English monarch, King William, sent a notoriously drunken and incompetent person, named Sloughter, to be governor and a lieutenant governor named Ingoldsby, who arrived in New York first. The aristocrats immediately lined Ingoldsby up with them and he demanded that Leisler hand over to him possession of the fort. Leisler, doubting his authority, refused.

The result was that he was arrested for high treason, as was Jacob Millborne, his son-in-law and secretary. They were tried before a court which was prejudiced against them and sentenced to be hanged. Sloughter hesitated to sign the death warrant but the leaders of the aristocratic party got him drunk and while he was in that condition he signed the papers without knowing what they were. So Leisler and Millborne went to the scaffold, around which gathered the common people, weeping and crying aloud when they saw their champions going to their deaths. From that day grew a deep resentment against the tyranny of British rulers which was to burn brighter during the long dispute of the next century and which was destined to make ardent patriots of the Dutch burghers of New York city when the fire of Revolution flamed out in 1775. So Jacob Leisler did not die in vain.

To Delve Into Mystery of Old Mexican Ruins

The Pathway of the Dead, leading from the Pyramid of the Moon, is to be restored this year as part of the government's campaign to penetrate the mysteries veiling Mexican civilizations before the Spanish conquered the country and destroyed so much because it was heathen.

The Pathway of the Dead is about one and one-half miles long, not far from Mexico City, and runs between two rows of burial mounds. In addition to bones, knives and such things found in the mounds, were found clay heads, believed to be effigies of interred priests. The ruins are Toltec, and were preserved by the Aztecs because this was Teotihuacan, the sacred town of the Toltec Indians who had preceded them.

New sites discovered in Queretaro are Toluquilla and Ranas, about 20 miles apart. They have the aspect of fortress cities, and important discoveries are expected. Although virtually everything there, including several great ball courts and much pottery, points to Toltec culture, there is also evidence of Totonac culture. Yokes, sculptured in stone, are typical only of Tononac culture. Some of these, found there, are believed to have been used to weight down the head in human sacrifice.

The ruined Mayan town of Palenque, which contains some of the best examples of Mayan art ever found, is to be entirely cleared. At present 20 acres has been dug out of the thick forest that covers it.

Excavations to be made at the comparatively newly discovered Zapotec ruins of Monte Alban are expected to shed much light on this civilization, since Zapotecan data is scarce. Monte Alban is situated along a mountain ridge, and surrounding it are fortresses and shrines.

At Chichen Itza the Ball court and the Temple of the Tigers, adjoining ruins of great importance, will be reconstructed. The Ball court was a rectangular field inclosed by massive walls, the Indians playing a game that is believed to have been similar to modern basketball.—Theodore A. Edlger, in the Detroit News.

Flyer Escapes Volcano

Flying for the first time over the Aniakcak volcano in Alaska, 21 miles in circumference, a plane, piloted by Harry Blune and carrying a mechanic and a passenger, was sucked by the hot gases into the crater. The plane was pulled insistently toward the pit, and only by a sudden dive away from the hot mouth, did the pilot save the ship from plunging in. Sulphur fumes were noticeable 40 miles from the pit and at more than 6,000 feet in the air, the flyers reported.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Reckless

Mons. Coty, reputed to be the richest man in France, declares that Americans live too swiftly to get any real enjoyment out of life. "They waste life, just as they waste the perfumes that I sell them. Of course, it makes money for me, but it is not good for them.

"I spoke of this swift pace at which you Americans go, to a friend of mine who laughed and replied:

"'Ah, yes, you are right. On my last visit to New York, a man who stopped on a street corner to tie his shoe was pointed out as an old landmark.'"

Now You Need Not Fear Coughs

It is always important to get a cough under control as quickly as possible. Too often it may otherwise prove the forerunner of something far more serious. One sure way to banish the fear of coughs and colds is to have in your medicine chest a bottle of B. & M., The Penetrating Germicide. Keep it ready for instant use when anyone in your family develops symptoms of a cold in the chest or a sore throat. Use B. & M. externally, just as you would a mustard plaster. You will find it many times as efficient and it gets quick results. Order from your regular druggist, or send us his name and $1.25 and we will send a full-size bottle postpaid. Valuable booklet free on request. F. E. Rollins Co., 53 Beverly St., Boston, Mass. (Adv.)

The Price of Wheat

NORTH DAKOTA'S PROSPERITY IS DEPENDENT
ENTIRELY ON THE PRICE FARMERS
OBTAIN FOR THEIR GRAIN

Cash winter wheat was selling in Kansas City Sept. 10th for 43c per bushel. On the same day cash spring wheat was selling in Minneapolis for 74c. Due to the low prices being paid for Southwestern wheats, mills in that section are able to produce a very cheap flour which they are now offering in North Dakota at a low price.

We wish to call the attention of the people of North Dakota to the fact that each time they purchase flour made from Southwestern wheat they not only receive a flour which is lower in quality than the flour they have been using and which will make fewer loaves per sack but are helping to bring the price of spring wheat down to the low level now being paid for Southern wheats.

Held Annual Meeting

The member of the Holt Commercial Club held their annual meeting on Friday evening in the offices of the local bank and had a big time.

All the members paid in their dues for the coming year and most of them attended the meeting. Several different projects were discussed and plans were made for the club to stage a community pep fest for both the men and women instead of the annual smoker for men only.

H. O. Hanson, who has been president of the club for the past five years, was again reelected to head the organization for the coming year and Geo. Fricker was elected secretary-treasurer.

Don't Get Stung

If you ever go to Warren don't patronize the Cities Service oil station located on the corner of highways No. 6 and 33 in that city, as there they charge you more for service than any place we have been to.

They charged our local pastor 75c to put a cold patch on a tube after he had taken the tire off of the car and rolled it in for them. Yet, the service was poor and the fellow that done the work had a grouch on like a caged up bear when we were there Sunday evening. Maybe the manager of the station should change this robbing method so he won't get advertised.

A. L. Carlson, Leslie Shaver, Theo. Ness, Hans Larson and E. A. Enger spent Sunday at Iland Lake on a duck hunt. No ducks were brought home by the local nimrods.

ESTRAY—A yearling heifer came to my place about two weeks ago. Owner may have same by paying for feed and this ad. —Henry S. Van Pelt, on the F. E. Kaiser farm, 2 miles east of Steiner. 30

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fricker and Mr. and Mrs. Hans Wahlin and family motored to Detroit Lakes Sunday. Maynard Bergman of Evansville, Minnesota met them there and came back here with them to stay at the Wahlin home for a few weeks.

ANNOUNCEMENT

I am now settled in my new location in the building next to the Bank on the east side, and am ready to serve you in my line of business.

Skim-milk as a Protein Feed

Many farmers are using skim-milk as a very successful substitute for linseed meal to supply the protein in the ration. One gallon of skim-milk is equal to one pound of linseed meal and may be fed in that proportion, giving even better results than the meal and also utilizing what might otherwise be a waste product.

The following makes a good balanced ration for a 1000 to 1200 pound cow giving an average flow of milk:

Corn silage	30 lbs.
Prairie hay	10 "
Bran	4 "
Barley	3 "
Oats	3 "
Skim-milk	2 gallons.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Sagstuen and son Raymond were callers at the J. Moberg home at Gatzke Tuesday evening.

A New Story

We are this week starting a new serial story called "The Vale of Aragon."

This romantic story has its beginning in old New Orleans, when a dashing young cavalier and swordsman lately released from service with the army of Andrew Jackson, follows the light of love in the eyes of a senorita—a flame that leads him to Venezuela and into the heart of the struggle captained by Simon Bolivar---the struggle which definitely loosened the hold of Spain in the Western Hemisphere.

Evangelist Vaswig of Fargo conducted services for several Lutheran congregations here last week.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

We are busy planning for the big carnival on Friday evening. We hope to have a large crowd.

The American History Class have received map books and are to follow up in their daily lessons by working out the required exercises in the map-manuals.

Feeding stations for birds are now being made in Biology class.

1st & 2nd GRADES

LeRoy still has the greatest number of books on his library shelf.

We are going to keep charts for brushing our teeth. The child that has his teeth brushed every day for one month will receive a Skeezix holder with tooth brush and paste.

Reuben Ness has been our best teacher so far. We are waiting to see who will be best for this month.

All our Hallowe'en decorations are up. We made owls from hard-boiled eggs. The children thought they'd like to eat such an owl.

The first grade got their Primers last week. They are enjoying them very much. We have two groups in reading, the Bunny Rabbits and the Gray Squirrels. We are all trying to become Gray Squirrels.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The 5th grade Geography class is now studying the United States.

The 3d graders are making Indian dolls in connection with the Indian project.

The 4th graders made traveling bags in Geography. They are using them to gather souvenirs from the different lands they travel in.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

On Friday afternoon of last week we organized a Little Citizens League with the following officers:

Clayton Gunheim, pres.
Gertrude Nohre, vice-pres.
Opal Sanoden, recess officer

The League will meet and have a program every other Friday during the last two periods in the afternoon.

To give more of the pupils experience in the duties of the different offices, new officers will be elected for each month.

During our singing periods the past week, we have learnt the Anvil Chorus.

Monday in Art Class we made posters, some of which will be used at the Carnival.

Lorraine Engebretson has been absent because of illness during the past few days.

The sixth graders in language are writing letters to the pupils in a school at Frankfort-on-the-Rhine, Germany. We have been studying Germany in 6th grade Geography.

Can you beat it?

We read in the exchanges from the Red River Valley reports that people in other towns have had Lilacs bloom this month and one man had picked fresh strawberries from his garden a week ago. Ye Editor here picked a fresh bouquet of Candytuft and Phlox from his flower garden this week, and still he has snapdragons budding to bloom out in November. What have you that is rare.

There will be band practice every Tuesday evening in the Holt school house, until further notice.

The VALE OF ARAGON

By FRED McLAUGHLIN

Author of "The Blade of Picardy"

Copyright by Bobbs-Merrill Co.
(WNU Service.)

Romance here holds sway; romance in the spirit of Dumas, his dashing guardsmen, titled adventurers, intriguing plots and exciting episodes. Loren Garde, of Norse and French ancestry, big and blond as a Viking, nimble of movement and with the sword thrust of D'Artagnan, is a hero of breath-taking interest. He tells his own enthralling story.

It is a story of hazard and exploit, desperate chances and romantic passion. Loren meets Dulce, fairest of Spain's daughters in the Western world, and finds his loyalty divided between her and the cause he is called upon to serve. In the wake of that conflict of devotions come duels and dangers, conspiracies and disguises, plot and counterplot. Surprise follows on surprise, glory on despair.

Loren Garde is a wildcat in fight, a tempest in love, and a mighty poor follower of any leader except the greatest. But the leader is at hand; no less a personage than Simon Bolivar, "the Liberator," the George Washington of South America.

The indomitable Bolivar, who could at will play the melody of love or the slaughter-song of hate upon the heart-strings of his people, is familiar to the annals of history but has never before appeared so vividly in fiction. The author has gone far beyond the name of this personage and brought to light the man.

CHAPTER I

—1—

Moon-Madness

I sat, one night, upon an iron bench and studied the Cabildo—to me the most imposing building in that historic city which lies, crescent-like, within the curving sweep of the Mississippi. Musing, I watched the scroll of history unroll before me. I saw De Bienville and those hardy followers of his who had erected the first house of the Crescent city; I saw the Spaniards pass—moving to the west and south—the Frenchmen come and go, and the Spaniard come again; and I heard the thunderous shouts from a thousand throats as Claiborne unfurled from the iron balcony of the old Cabildo the Stars and Stripes, emblem of the new republic.

"Ah, well," I said, half to myself, half to the vanishing shades of history, "the varying fortunes of Louisiana belong to the past; she is safe now within the fold. No more will she be ruled by kings and queens, courtiers and courtesans."

Whereupon a sound broke into my reverie—the lilt of a woman's laugh, as clear as the note of a mocking bird.

"But, your majesty," said the voice in Spanish, "if we walk two more squares along this way we shall have passed the levee and cast ourselves into the river."

"Name of G—d!" I gasped, leaping to my feet. There was something in that musical voice that touched a vibrant cord in my soul, and the young blood flamed through my veins. As I stood, trembling in this new emotion, three figures left the shadows of the Cabildo and, moving southward, crossed Chartres street, turned to the left and approached the point where I stood, three figures who might have stepped from a Titian canvas. One was a slim graceful courtier with a scabbard that flashed in the moonlight with every movement of his left knee; the other two were a king and a queen of old Spain, bearing, each of them, all the trappings of royalty.

Speechless, I stared, wondering vaguely if, by some grotesque twist of fate, this consciousness of mine could have been thrown back three centuries; yet, yonder stood the Cabildo, this was New Orleans, and the time—I felt certain—was the year of our Lord eighteen hundred twenty-one. But had she not said, "Your majesty," and did they not look like sovereigns of ancient Spain? Unheeding, I drank deep of the beauty of this modern Isabella.

She had all the regal dignity and poise of Spain's great queen; Titian himself might have arranged the wavy blue-black hair. Her eyes in the moonlight seemed to hold purple shadows, her face was pale, her lips half parted; a fragile hand, inquiring and partly closed, pressed against the curve of cheek and chin.

His majesty, a sturdy man with heavy shoulders, square full beard and broad forehead, spoke deep in his massive chest; but, deaf and dumb and blind to all the world save the woman who stood before me, I paid no heed.

Except for the lovely, gracious lady who is my mother, woman had hardly touched my life; yet here was I, lost in the depths of a lady's eyes, a lady I had never seen until this night. Madness? Aye, a sudden and overwhelming madness, and no more to be explained than the alchemy of love itself.

As I stood, dazed, faltering, his majesty's voice, which held a rasping, hostile note, beat into my consciousness: "Have the amber wines of old Didier touched thy brain, dolt, or is stupidity the natural heritage of Yankees?"

"It may be that he cannot hear," the lady said kindly, "—cannot understand." Then in swift French to me: "Is it that you do not know the Spanish, Monsieur, cannot hear the voice?"

I tried to smile—a sorry effort, for the past, as well as the spell of her beauty, still bore upon me. "We of New Orleans must know three languages, your majesty," I faltered; "and a voice that is like music—"

"Carraca!" The magic of the night and the misty vaporings of my wine-mused mind gave way to grim realities of the moment, for the broad-shouldered man who chose to ape a king advanced upon me threateningly. He tried to brush me aside with the sweep of a muscular arm, but I swung a hard and, I think, efficient fist; for a year of campaigning in that tatterdemalion army under General Jackson had given me many things, not the least of which was the healthy American knack of rough-and-tumble fighting. Under a blow that found his whiskered jaw his majesty went to his hands and knees, then he came swiftly to his feet, right hand seeking his hip, and the slim blade of a smallsword gleamed in the moonlight.

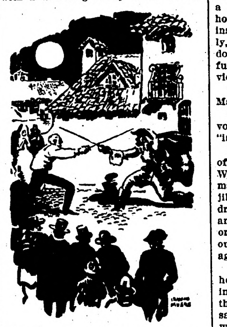
"Not so hasty, Adolfo," said the graceful courtier, whose face, I noticed, possessed so much of the high beauty of the face of the lady that I knew him for her brother; "you must—"

"A dog," Adolfo gasped. "Why should I not run him through? Did he not accost us; did he not stare at Carisima; did not the stupid clod lay violent hands upon a Fuentes?"

"But, Adolfo mio," said her majesty, "he is unarmed."

Ah, sweet angel! I was unarmed—she had noticed it. I bent a worshiping head. "Your majesty is too kind; I was but a lonely being, who, dreaming on a bench in the moonlight, heard a voice coming out of the night, and a vision—"

"Loco!" cried Adolfo, emphasizing the charge of madness against me with a whistling sweep of his sword.



With a Frenzied Burst of Charges He Built Up a Gleaming Wall of Steel in Front of Me.

"Give him thy blade, Polito; must I waste the evening on a stupid ladrone?"

Polito, reading my face, found acquiescence there. He drew his sword, grasped the point with thumb and forefinger and, resting the gleaming steel across his left forearm, extended the hilt to me. I caught it in eager fingers, for she had called him "mio"; and that proprietary "Carisima" of his had kindled a fire of senseless jealousy within me. Polito's weapon balanced like a feather in my hand; a Toledo blade, in truth. I swung it in a tentative arc, and the air sang beneath that blow.

His majesty shrugged out of the long cape and, point raised, advanced upon me. "Guard," said he.

I think the hissing cadence of my sword touched a cord of cowardice in his majesty; I think he must have realized that it was not a stupid clod who stood before him, and I'm sure such realization added nothing to his confidence.

"Not so fast, Senor," I cried; "do you not know that the road to hell is traveled in haste, while heaven is reached more slowly?" He swore in his beard, and I continued: "If I should hazard a guess as to your masquerade I would say that you are Charles the Fifth of Spain, a noble king who lived three hundred years ago; but your actions and your words belie your regal trappings."

"Guard, Senor!" he gasped.

Now a devil of impudence perched upon my tongue: "And your lady will be the gracious Eleanor, yet lovelier by far than the consort of your ancient namesake; aye, infinitely more beautiful than Spain's great queen herself, the splendid Isabella, whose charm has furnished through the centuries the motif for song and story."

"He is mad," she breathed, "mad!"

And so I was, I think.

"Must I run you through, dolt?" Adolfo cried.

My moon-madness disappeared, my brain cleared, confidence was mine. And, as I laughed aloud from the sheer joy of the thing, our blades came together with a rasping whisper.

I felt of his wrist, and found an iron rigidity there; I tried a tentative tierce, and met a swift, efficient parry. No mean adversary, this powerful Spaniard in his regal raiment. We swept back and forth, our blades whipping the air in whining arcs, or hissing together in venomous slitherings, our labored breathing coming and going through set teeth, our feet tapping and sliding along the pavement, every muscle of our bodies tensed, every nerve alert, every glance searching—searching for an opening, and every fleeting thought building plans of attack and parry.

As we contended thus a circle of curious gathered—gathered silently from nowhere. They spoke in awed whispers, as though the spell of this night of madness lay upon them also.

Polito came within my view as we circled and parried and offered riposte and swift counter-riposte. I smiled at him, for Polito had too much of the beauty and grace of her majesty to gain any enmity from me. I was happy to find a friendly light in his eyes. Now I caught a glimpse of the lady, upon whose exquisite face lay the pallor of fear. A fear, no doubt, for the sturdy Spaniard who had called her Carisima . . . and she had called him mio. And here was I, mad with an inexplicable and overwhelming love, a love that was—because of its utter hopelessness—nothing short of sheer insanity. Whereupon I laughed wildly, and charging with reckless abandon, beat my adversary down with a furious attack that carried me near to victory.

"Nearly," I cried, "nearly, Your Majesty!"

"Nearly," he answered, and his deep voice came almost in a gasping sob, "is never quite enough."

Now, when I heard the labored effort of his voice I knew that I had won. With the realization that I was his master my youthful pride offered a jibe or two: "Cannot a lonely being dream in the moonlight, Your Majesty, and conjure up the figures of the past, or look with favor upon a lady without the charge of madness being placed against him?"

With a frenzied burst of charges he built up a gleaming wall of steel in front of me. I moved back before that last attack, listening with fine satisfaction to the labored breath that whistled through his teeth, for he had nearly reached the end—and knew it. And when I felt a weakening of that iron wrist of his, and noted the diminishing power of his lunges, and saw the look of animal terror that leaped into his eyes, a deep disgust for the man entered my soul. I would let her see the terror in his eyes, I would have her know the craven that he was, and if she chose to love him then. . . .

I advanced in attack now with all the reserve force that I possessed. Parrying wildly, he retreated before this final offensive. I think the fear of imminent death had touched his brain, for when I thrust, and felt the steel take hold, I heard him offer up a sigh almost of contentment.

His sword, falling from nerveless fingers, clattered upon the cobbles; with a soft cry of "Carisima" he went to his knees, and then like a man who is very tired he crumpled slowly to the pavement. A passion of resentment, of disgust, still burned within me. "Charles the Fifth indeed," I said, casting my sword to the ground beside him; "bah—you should be called Charles the Last!"

I turned away as her majesty dropped to her knees beside the fallen man. "Ah, 'Dolfo mio," she cried, "Adolfo!"

"Carisima," he said again.

Polito laid a hand upon my arm. "We would apologize, Senor."

"To me," I gasped; "you and—and—?"

"Yes, Senor—my sister, the Senorita Lamartina. We have just lately come from a bal masque, where Adolfo has doubtless looked too often upon the bottom of an emptied wine glass. May I hope that you will let me offer our apologies?"

I laughed aloud in a sudden and unexplainable excess of happiness. Then she wasn't his wife! "The Senor and his sister will find me ever at their service," I said. "One never knows—a time may come—"

"You are kind, Senor, as well as a gentleman of high courage."

Seaman Is Remembered as Rescuer of Crusoe

William Dampier is one of the most extraordinary figures in the story of exploration. He was a great navigator and a great explorer; but he was also a buccaneer with a reputation for cruelty. His name is remembered for two reasons. First, because he was undoubtedly the first English seaman to set eyes on Australia and the first explorer to do any hydrographical surveys there. Secondly, while buccaneering, he took part in some of the most amazing exploits of the so-called Brethren of the Coast, crossed the Isthmus of Darien and was present at the sacking of Santa Marta. Twice the government sent Dampier to the South seas. The second time he returned poor and ill, wrote a "Vindication," and lived to sail again on the famous voyage that thrilled the world by the rescue of Alexander Selkirk, the sailor who was marooned on Juan Fernandez island and became immortal as Robinson Crusoe.—Montreal Family Herald.

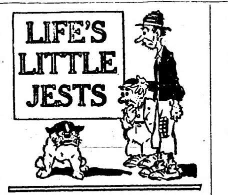
One Saving Grace

The mistress was looking over the new maid's references before engaging her.

"Do you think you will settle down here?" she asked, after a while. "Remember, you've left a good many situations."

The girl smiled confidently.

"Yes, ma'am," she replied. "But I didn't leave any of them voluntarily." —London Tit-Bits.



MEEKNESS

"Who was the first man?" asked the visiting minister.

"Adam," the children all answered in chorus.

"Who was the first woman?"

"Eve," they all shouted.

"Who was the meekest man?"

"Moses."

"Who was the meekest woman?"

Everyone was silent. The children looked blankly at one another, but none could answer. Finally a little hand went up, and the preacher said:

"Well, my boy, who was she?"

"There wasn't any."—The Kablegram.

Interest

"I may as well confess that I am not as picturesque and prominent a figure as I expected to become when I amassed great wealth," said Mr. Dustin Stax.

"I have no doubt," replied Miss Cayenne, "that many are surprised to see how much easier it is to make dollars draw interest than to make them create interest."

Otherwise, All Right

"You never go on fishing trips, do you?" said Smithers.

"No," growled Withers. "I never have any luck, am a poor liar, don't drink and don't care a hang about either catching or eating fish."

Goodby to Both

Mother was coaxing Sally Lou to eat. "If you don't eat these carrots mother is going away."

To which the child quickly retorted: "Take the carrots with you."

Practical Mind

"When that man asked you for serious advice you insisted on lending him money."

"Yes," replied Mr. Dustin Stax. "Sometimes a lift is of more value than an 'uplift.'"

In a Manner of Speaking

Mrs. Jones—Well, I see your husband is home helping you.

Mrs. Peck—Yes, now that he has retired from business he can do just as he pleases.

Fertile Tracts Formed by Overflow of Rivers

The behavior of rivers is a fascinating subject to study.

The speed of a river will frequently be changed by the nature of the land through which it flows.

For example, a river will come tumbling down a mountain slope and then enter a flat plain. This causes a great change in the velocity of the river. As the river slows up upon the plain, it can no longer carry all the sediment which it has been bringing down the mountain side. Hence, it will deposit much of the sediment at the foot of the mountain where it enters the plain.

This deposit usually takes the form of a fan-shaped deposit like a section of a cone with its apex in the foot of the mountain. It is known to the geologist as an alluvial cone.

A river will also deposit much of its sediment when it meets with some obstruction which temporarily slows it up. These deposits are known as bars. They are not permanent. A bar will form for a time. Then some change in conditions will cause it to be swept away again while a new bar forms somewhere else.

Another type of deposit occurs where a river flows through a wide flat valley. During a flood season, the river will overflow its banks and spread out over the valley. But the outer reaches of the flood will not have a velocity like the central portion of the stream.

Consequently the sediment will be deposited there and after the flood recedes the valley will be covered with a thick layer of sediment. This is known as a flood plain. These flood plains are usually composed of very fine sediment. As a result, they usually form fertile tracts of land which are extremely valuable for agricultural purposes.

Legend Tells Why Cat Is Friendly to Women

It was the Makambo, our guide, who told us the story of the Cat, as we sat round the camp fire after the day's journey through the jungle, writes Marie Friedenson, in News Chronicle. "Since the first of days," he said, gravely, in his native Swahili (which, with its soft consonants and liquid vowels, is curiously reminiscent Italian), "the cat has always been the friend of woman, because he is wise. One day in the jungle he was disputing with other small beasts for food, when a lion passed, and all but the cat ran away.

"The lion made no attempt to hurt him, so the cat, believing him to be the greatest of all beasts, said to himself, 'I shall stay with him, and then no one shall harm me.' So they traveled together for many days; but one day the lion was overcome by an elephant, and the cat, seeing him vanquished, made friends with the elephant. They, too, traveled together through the jungle; but one day the elephant fell into a pit that a man had dug, and the man came up and killed him.

"The cat looked at him in astonishment and thought, 'Surely cunning prevails against might; now, therefore, I have found the king and master of the beasts.' So he made friends with the man. They journeyed on together to the man's village, and when they had reached it, the women who was the man's wife ran out of one of the huts to greet him, and when she saw he had not brought back from the jungle the meat she had wanted, began to abuse him, and beat him about the head with a pot, and the man ran away; so the cat, being wise, made friends with the woman and has stayed with her always in the villages to this day."

When You CAN'T QUIT

Fatigue is the signal to rest. Obey it if you can. When you can't, keep cool and carry-on in comfort.

Bayer Aspirin was meant for just such times, for it insures your comfort. Freedom from those pains that nag at nerves and wear you down. One tablet will block that threatening headache while it is still just a threat. Take two or three tablets when you've caught a cold, and that's usually the end of it.

Carry Bayer Aspirin when you travel. Have some at home and keep some at the office. Like an efficient secretary, it will often "save the day" and spare you many uncomfortable, unproductive hours. Perfectly harmless, so keep it handy, keep it in mind, and use it. No man of affairs can afford to ignore the score and more of uses explained in the proven directions. From a grumbling tooth to those rheumatic pains which seem almost to bend the bones, Bayer Aspirin is ready with its quick relief—and always works. Neuralgia. Neuritis. Any nagging, needless pain.

Bayer-Tablets of Aspirin Genuine

Get the genuine tablets, stamped with the Bayer cross. They are of perfect purity, absolute uniformity, and have the same action every time. Why experiment with imitations costing a few cents less? The saving is too little. There is too much at stake. But there is economy in the purchase of genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets in the large bottles.

Ice Sixty Years Old

Steam shovels struck a mass of frozen debris during stripping operations in Yorktown, Pa., at a time when the workingmen were almost prostrated by the hot weather. Dynamite had to be used to crack the ice which had formed nearly 60 years ago during a severe winter. Waste materials from the coal mines had insulated the frozen debris so that it never thawed.

A fool's bolt is soon shot.

Custom That Governed Early Iceland Unions

Marriage among the early Norse settlers of Iceland was, then as now, a matter which concerned the kindred, and it is emphasized in nearly all northern and Icelandic history that there must be substantial equality in prestige and in material circumstances between the man and the woman about to contract a marriage. When members of different families intermarried, rights and obligations on both sides arose, because thereafter controversies were regarded as of common interest to all members. Conduct might result in a fine, which, in turn, would become an obligation of remote relatives. Hence, relatives of a young man, deemed qualified to enter the married state, acted as ambassadors in his behalf to the relatives of the woman; but they did not save on rare occasions, go to the lady herself. It was among the conditions of the right of inheritance in children—really of legitimacy—that their mother had become engaged with the consent of her relatives, that adequate dower had been forthcoming, and that a legal wedding had been held.

Sometimes want of rank was balanced by superior wealth and the match was deemed satisfactory—such was the situation in the story of Gudmund the Rich, about 1187, when the match between Teit and Oddkatla was approved. He came from a better family, but she was wealthier. Except for the presence of complete candor, which characterized these Scandinavian matchmakers, the Sagas contain numerous parallels to the modern and common case of the rich daughter and the pauper duke.—From Pioneers of Freedom, by Sveinbjorn Johnson.

Orange Pekoe

The word "pekoe" is an Anglicized form of a Chinese phrase meaning "white hair" or down. There is such a down on parts of the tea plant in the early spring. Pekoe tea is composed of young leaves, picked while the down is still on them, and roasted at a low temperature.

BABY FRETFUL, RESTLESS?
Look to this cause

When your baby fusses, tosses and seems unable to sleep restfully, look for one common cause, doctors say. Constipation. To get rid quickly of the accumulated wastes which cause restlessness and discomfort, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Castoria, you know, is made specially for children's delicate needs. It is a pure vegetable preparation; contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics. It is so mild and gentle you can give it to a young infant to relieve colic. Yet it is as effective for older children. Castoria's regulative help will bring relaxed comfort and restful sleep to your baby. Keep a bottle on hand. Genuine Castoria always has the name:

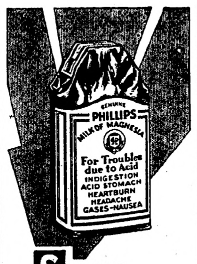
A Brave Man's Speech

Samuel H. Church, the head of the new Liberal party, said in New York the other day:

"To belong to our new party will take courage. But nothing can be done without courage. Remember what Pompey the Great said when he wanted to sail his grain ships to starving Rome and the sailors were afraid to raise anchor on account of the terrible storm.

"'It is necessary to go,' said Pompey. 'It is not necessary to live.'"

A thing of comfort is seldom a joy to the woman of fashion.



SOUR STOMACH

JUST a tasteless dose of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia in water. That is an alkali, effective yet harmless. It has been the standard antacid for 50 years. One spoonful will neutralize at once many times its volume in acid. It's the right way, the quick, pleasant and efficient way to kill all the excess acid. The stomach becomes sweet, the pain departs. You are happy again in five minutes.

Don't depend on crude methods. Employ the best way yet evolved in all the years of searching. That is Phillips' Milk of Magnesia. Be sure to get the genuine.

Merely Out for a Night

Princess Patricia, African lioness, escaped from her cage in a city park at Ely, Nev. Children were kept indoors, innocent dogs frightened hysterical people, and posses searched the hills all night. And in the morning the princess was in her open cage where she had slipped in unobserved after a night out.

Indiana Tree Planter Takes Long Look Ahead

A friend in the Middle West who is enough of a philosopher to take a long-distance view in matters financial writes us:

"I am happy to advise you that my tree planting experiment out in Indiana continues to have every prospect of ultimate success. I have now planted about 225,000 trees in two years, and, under the Indiana law, it is all exempt from taxation except on the valuation of $1 per acre. I expect to put in about 2,000,000 trees and then leave them in trust for my grandchildren. The cost of doing this will not be in excess of $30,000 and in about seventy-five years they will be worth approximately $2,000,000 to $4,000,000, as I am planting only trees that will have cabinet wood value, such as black walnut, poplar, spruce and wild cherry. I will get my reward out of this in the pleasure that I will have in seeing my trees grow and in the hunting and fishing I will have at my lodge."—Commerce and Finance.

GARFIELD TEA A Natural Laxative Drink

3 RULES
big help to BOWELS

What a joy to have the bowels move like clockwork, every day! It's easy, if you mind these simple rules of a famous old doctor:

1. Drink a big tumblerful of water before breakfast, and several times a day.
2. Get plenty of outdoor exercise without unduly fatiguing yourself.
3. Try for a bowel movement at exactly the same hour every day.

Everyone's bowels need help at times, but the thing to use is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. You'll get a thorough cleaning-out, and it won't leave your insides weak and watery. This family doctor's prescription is just fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin, and other helpful ingredients that couldn't hurt a child. But how it wakes up those lazy bowels! How good you feel with your system rid of all that poisonous waste matter.

FLOUR and BUTTER

THERE HAS BEEN FOR YEARS AGITATION IN NORTH Dakota against the use of butter substitutes as the use of such substitutes limits the use of butter which in turn lowers the price of butter fats.

THE WHEAT RAISING STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA IS now confronted with a similar problem due to the low priced flours now being offered for sale in this state. These flours are made from Southwestern wheats which are selling at about 30c per bushel less than is being paid by North Dakota mills for spring wheat.

WE WISH TO IMPRESS ON NORTH DAKOTA PEOPLE that each time they purchase such flour they are aiding in bringing down the price of spring wheat to the Kansas level, and limiting the output of their North Dakota Mills.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of $1157.20, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by John W. Eells and Edith Eells, his wife, Mortgagors, to Chistopher Graham, Mortgagee, bearing date the 22nd day of April, 1926, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., in Book 111 of Mortgages, on page 254, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage or any part thereof.

NOW, THEREFORE, NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The Southwest Quarter (SW¼) of Section Eight (8), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty (40) West, of the Fifth Principal Meridian, containing 160 acres, according to the United States Government Survey thereof, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Marshall County at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren, in said County and State, on the 12th day of December, 1931, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of $1157.20, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and $50.00 Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

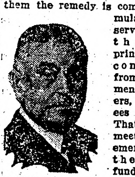
PLANS TO BEAT UNEMPLOYMENT

By ROME C. STEPHENSON
President American Bankers Association



R. C. STEPHENSON

SOME look upon unemployment as a social or political problem. For them the remedy is compulsory accumulation of reserve funds on the insurance principle through contributions from the government, the employers, the employees or all three. That will not meet the present emergency, since these reserve funds have not been built up and it would take years to do so. At best this plan could only become effective at some indefinite time in the future as against the return of another catastrophe of general unemployment. Others look upon unemployment as purely an economic problem, holding that the only fundamental preventive is in business stability.

It may well be asked whether either of these cures—namely, the creation of unemployment insurance funds on the one hand or the maintenance of everlasting business stability on the other—do not present in themselves bigger problems than the problems they seek to cure. However I am inclined to the belief that the more practical approach to the solution of such problems and the prevention of such situations as general unemployment presents is along the latter lines of economic foresight rather than along lines of social legislation.

National Foresight

Economic foresight is conceivable not only for the individual but for business as a whole. Millions of individuals and virtually all lines of industry failed to practice it during the last stages of the recent prosperity.

The public welfare of the United States demands that industry as a whole vigorously and sincerely devote itself to the development of plans of economic foresight, aimed to prevent repetitions of the present unemployment situation. The general outlines for such plans are clearly definable. They demand that industry adopt a long range viewpoint and lay out its production and distribution plans with the thought that it is far better to have a long period of good sound business activity than a short period of frantically over-competitive endeavor. This would tend to lessen over-production in various lines, to prevent over-expansion of plant capacity, to avoid over-stimulation of public buying and above all to avoid periods of slumps and stagnation following periods of over-stimulation with their disasters of unemployment.

For business, too, there is a part in such a conception of economic foresight. It should aim to cooperate with industry in its endeavor to avoid reckless over-production, over-stocking and over-selling the public.

In this picture of national economic prudence, banking and finance, too, have their place. Their effort should be to influence the use of credit and other financial facilities into channels of sound public economy consistent with the attitude I have already sketched for industry and trade. All finance, whether current commercial banking or industrial investment banking, should seek by their influence in granting or witholding credit to stimulate and build up a balanced economic situation.

The Individual Must Help

Finally, the individual too has a place in any such plan of a sounder economic future for the United States. It is the duty of the individual to make every effort to take care of himself and provide for himself. Neither government nor industry can do that for him. They can give him the opportunity to succeed but they can't succeed for him. He must out of his own initiative and effort earn and create his own means and defenses against the requirements and contingencies of life.

Individual determination to provide against sickness, accident and death by insurance before indulgences in extra comforts and luxuries are given place in the family budget, and individual responsibility to guard against the contingency of unemployment by means of a sound program of thrift and savings are to my mind the true foundation of economic stability for the United States as a whole.

Red Cross Roll Call Begins Armistice Day

The membership Roll Call of the Marshall County Red Cross Chapter, will begin here Nov. 11th, Dr. H. M. Blegen, Chapter Chairman, announced today. Workers will visit people at their homes and places of business to extend a personal invitation to join the organization for the coming year, he explained, and called attention to the fact that the Red Cross Roll Call is an annual event occupying the time between Armistice Day and Thanksgiving, emphasized by presidential proclamation and governors' statements, and especially in the public focus because 1931 is the Fiftieth Anniversary of the founding of the Red Cross. "Last Year's Roll Call resulted in 326 members for our chapter here, and 4,075,649 in the United States and its insular possessions.

"This support from the people in our territory enabled us to participate in Red Cross work throughout the country, and to conduct a program of service here. Red Cross chapters are democratic in charecter. Membership carries a vote in chapter affairs, and signifies personal participation in local, national and international service. The history of roll calls has proved that joining the Red Cross is a highly regarded privelege."

Red Cross memberships are: Annual $1.00, Contributind $5.00 Sustaining $10.00 and Supporting $25.00. Only 50c of each of these goes to support the work done in the name of all chapters by the National organization. The balance remains at home for local service.

The following children are on the Honor Roll:

First Grade:
  Elaine Tollefsrud
  Ruth Halvorson
  Ruby Halvorson
Second Grade:
  LeRoy Frederickson
  Russell Sanoden
  Lois Hanson

Last Thursday the children in Miss Lanman's room were invited in to our Hallowe'en party. We had a good time bobbing and jumping for apples and doing stunts.

Reuben Ness has been our best teacher during September and October. We are having a new "Best Teacher" chart for November and December.

We are making Poetry Books in the Second Grade and Alphabet Books in the First Grade, so we are busy cutting out the letters.

Lois and LeRoy had 100 in Spelling last Friday.

Mrs. Tollefsrud visited our room Monday afternoon.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES Honor Roll

The honor students for the first six weeks were:

Fifth Grade

The children in the third, fourth and fifth grades are making Indian belts in their art class.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

On Friday afternoon we had a little Hallowe'en party which we all enjoyed very much.

Opal Sanoden had the best and neatest letter written to pupils in the school at Frankfort-on-Rhine, Germany.

In Art Class we have been working on booklet covers. The Sixth grades are making booklets for Language; the Seventh graders, for History, and the Eighth graders for Citizenship.

Lorraine Engebretson is back to school after a week's absence because of illness.

Louis and Margaret Sagstuen have been absent for some time.

The Eighth grade in Arithmetic is working on Profit and Loss and Commercial Discounts.

In the seventh grade we are making climatic and rainfall maps of Africa.

Orlene Hagglund and Gertrude Nohre are making up the program for the second meeting of the Little Citizens League.

What Quality Cream Means

The following was taken from "Hoard's Dairyman" of October 25, 1931, and gives a mighty good idea of the value of cleanliness and proper feeding and handling methods in the production of Land O'Lakes foods.

"To Land O'Lakes Sweet Cream Butter (produced by Land O'Lakes Crys., Inc.) goes the honor of being the first butter to bear the 'accepted' seal of the Committee on Foods of the American Medical Association."

Such a distinction is one the Farmers of Minnesota can feel justly proud of, knowing that they have produced a food accepted as the highest standard of fine quality foods.

20 YEARS AGO

Items Clipped From The Northern Light for the Issue of Nov. 10, 1911.

Miss Mable Knutson and Ed Furr made a combined business and pleasure trip to Thief River.

The Great Northern installed daily freight service on this line and were enjoying a good run of fall business.

Reg Walker arrived here from Emarado, No. Dak. with a car of stock and machinery which he took out to his father's homestead near Mud Lake.

Magnus Grondahl, Oscar Anderson, Fred and Ole Larson transacted businas in Thief River Falls.

Henry Wendt made a business trip to Middle River.

Esther Mickelson came up from Thief River to visit at her home.

Henry Werner attended the buttermakers convention down at Crookston.

Ole Matson came up from the city of Crookston to run the Red Lake Falls Milling Co's. elevator here. Nels Engebretson, former manager was appointed as postmaster.

Mrs. Chas. Latta attended the funeral of her father at Spirit Lake, Iowa.

A bad prairie fire destroyed much grain, farm buildings and livestock southeast of Mud Lake.

P. L. Anderson spent a few weeks in St. Paul where he took a buttermakers' short course.

Nazareth Lutheran Church Dedicated 20 Years Ago

With most impressive services the Nazareth Lutheran church of Holt was dedicated on Nov. 7 1911. A large number of visiting clergymen and delegates took part in the exercises which lasted for three days. The church was filled to overflowing during these services.

Rev. M. B. Ordahl who had already served the congregation many years, was the local pastor.

An Echo From War-Time

Of all the World War slogans, none was more inspiring than the simple call: "Do your bit." On Armistice Day we again think of the glory of that "bit".

This slogan was inspiring because it implied a great truth. It showed the importance, the worth-whileness of little things.

Just as each little daily effort, multiplied by thousands, won the war, so will the little efforts -- the financial dimes and nickels--win personal success for you. Make your Savings Account in this bank grow daily.

CHILD need REGULATING?

CASTORIA WILL DO IT!

When your child needs regulating, remember this: the organs of babies and children are delicate. Little bowels must be gently urged—never forced. That's why Castoria is used by so many doctors and mothers. It is specially made for children's ailments; contains no harsh, harmful drugs, no narcotics. You can safely give it to young infants for colic pains. Yet it is an equally effective regulator for older children. The next time your child has a little cold or fever, or a digestive upset, give him the help of Castoria, the children's own remedy. Genuine Castoria always has the name:

THE STORY

At nightfall, in the old city of New Orleans, in the year 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him.

The gathering circle had closed in to attend the wounded man, who—so I judged from the volume of his groans—had not received a mortal thrust. "Who is his majesty, Senor?" I asked.

"Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army under La Torre, who is governor of Venezuela."

"Then you go," I asked, "to Venezuela?"

Before he could answer my question a huge mulatto at my elbow voiced a warning bellow: "'De Charlies—heah dey come!" And a narrow-shouldered, pasty-faced wharf rat amplified it with a shrill: "Les gens d'armes!"

"If they should capture you, Senor?" Pelito said.

"Yet I have only offered a man's defense."

"True, but the least, Senor, will be an awkward and infinite proces-verbal, time and trials and an unfortunate wait, while the Senorita—"

I found his hand and gave it a warm clasp. "You will convey my regrets to the Senorita?"

"Assuredly, Senor."

"Then—adios."

"Adios, moon-wraith," he whispered, and I turned around and broke through the curious crowd.

Two of the "Charlies" barred my path. One received a stiff-armed jab in the chest that tumbled him over and over like a performing parrakeet, the other bent his body skilfully to evade a swinging fist, then he fired point-blank at my face and missed, which was nothing unusual at all, for the gens d'armes often miss.

Now I put my feet to the pavement and gave myself over to the business of silent running while the chase roared behind me. I directed my steps eastward, went north and east again into Rue Royal, and on and on, ever deeper into the French quarter. I passed vine-blanketed walls which, I knew, concealed quaint mansions and beautiful courtyards. As I ran I kept an eye searching for an adventitious entrance that might lead to one of these bowers of beauty, for the street itself offered no refuge.

I found, finally, a grilled gate which, opening to my touch, led under a graceful stone arch so low I had to bend my head to enter. I waited in the gloom of the areaway as sounds of the battue went by.

Silent, I crouched in the shadows long after the noises of the futile chase had died away, and waiting, I had a chance to view again the amazing events of this mad night. In fancy I heard again the music of the woman's laugh, and I saw the slim hands that pressed upon her bosom; that despairing cry of "'Dolfo mio" beat into my consciousness, and a fit of foolish trembling took possession of me.

I started for the oval of light that showed me the way to the street, but stopped when figures, turning in from the paved walk, blocked the passage. I heard the rasping scratch of a key in the lock of the iron gate and retreated warily, seeking the friendly shades as four men advanced upon me along the gloomy passage.

I came, anon, to a tiny courtyard, in the middle of which a table stood, bearing glasses, silver and a decanter or two. Over the table swung a huge brass lamp, yet the light it furnished was hardly brighter than that of the brilliant moon. I knew, of course, that the house would afford me no safety, so I flattened my tall body in a narrow, protecting apse in the brick wall that made up two sides of the courtyard. Standing straight and motionless, in grotesque mimicry of some saint who had doubtless occupied this space in time long past, I held my breath as the four figures went by. One was a swarthy, heavy-bodied brute who seemed to have the look of the sea about him; another had the square shoulders and the alert manner of a soldier; while the third was evidently a merchant and a man of means, for his manner and the sleek smoothness of his well-nourished figure held the complacency of mental and physical ease.

The fourth man gained, and continued to hold my closest attention. There was latent power in the poise of his lithe body, a look of the eagle in his eye, a rich resonance in the commanding tones of his voice.

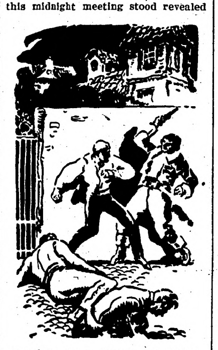
The suave host filled four glasses with an amber fluid and, proffering one to each of his guests with a light laugh, said: "This garden is ours, Senores, where flowers of intrigue may bloom in safety. Therefore, Francisco mio—" He bowed to him of the commanding poise.

Whereupon Francisco raised his glass. "To Simon Bolivar," he said, his deep vibrant voice intoning a sort of benediction, "the Liberator of our people!"

They drank slowly, standing, and after a reverent silence, murmured, "Viva, viva," and again, "Viva!"

Simon Bolivar? I had heard of him; who hadn't. Already they were calling him the George Washington of South America; this amazing soldier, statesman and patriot who, when only a youth, had plumbed the depths of despair in the loss of a young and beautiful bride, and had devoted his life thereafter to the service of his mother country, Venezuela. I gasped, and held my breath again for fear they would discover me. Nothing but the gloom of the apse hid me; had I stepped forward one yard I should have come within the glowing circle of the lamp and the silver light of the moon that filtered through the foliage.

So I continued the imitation of a saint while the men finished three bottles of Latour's best. It loosened their tongues so that the purpose of this midnight meeting stood revealed to me. I was aghast, for, although this new republic of the United States might have a very tender feeling and a definite sympathy for the struggling South American colonies, I knew it would not countenance a revolutionary junta within its boundaries.



But His Long Arm Came Down Swiftly.

"It was all too easy, Senores." Diego, the complacent merchant, was speaking. "Within the long, carefully twisted coils of tobacco are guns; ground tobacco in the kegs that we have loaded on the ship will burn with greater readiness than tobacco ever burned before—it will explode!" He laughed aloud. "One barrel of flour will hold two score of pistols, and even the innocent Indian corn has taken for traveling companions knives and bullets; while each huge slab of salt pork carries within its greasy interior a half dozen machetes. Unloaded at La Guaira this interesting shipment will move, unconsidered, through the Spanish lines, and the natives who wait for Simon Bolivar will be in readiness."

"A beautiful plan," said Francisco.

"We will drink upon it," the swarthy sailor suggested.

As I watched them drink a chill of fear touched my spine, and my tongue had an unfamiliar feel in my mouth. Looking upon the man whom nature had set apart to be a leader, I felt the thrust of his cold eyes over the edge of his wine glass. "How long since, my dear Diego," he asked then, "have you put another saint in the place reserved so long for San Isidro?"

He had found me; those sharp eyes of his had sought me out! Should I run, and if so, where? There was only the house, and the garden surrounded by a wall too high for unassisted scaling. Should I offer resistance to these four men, three of whom were doubtless armed, or should I surrender peaceably? It seemed certain that the knowledge I had acquired concerning their intent would be my death-warrant; they could not let me go and then continue further with their plan of revolution.

While I considered thus Diego answered: "I have put no saint in the place reserved for San Isidro; you jest, amigo."

"Sinner or saint, Diego mio," Francisco insisted, "there is a figure in the apse. The figure is taller by a shoulder than San Isidro, and he is garbed as the modern dandy of New Orleans. His hair, too, is not the dark hair of the Mexican patron, but light." He laughed shortly, and came to his feet. "He is an American saint, Diego, which is strange, for I had always believed that the pagan Americano had no saints."

He must have had the eyes of a lynx, and in his voice lay murder. As the swarthy sailor came toward my hiding place, the soldier drew a gleaming pistol.

"Not here—not in here!" Diego cried. "You cannot kill a man in my garden. Take him—take him alive, and move him to the river. Drown him, but do not shoot him in my garden!"

Senor Sailor, his bloodshot eyes staring stupidly, thrust his dark face within range of my fist, and I swung swiftly. It caught him fair upon the point of a heavy chin. Tumbling backward, he fell with sharp violence against the table, which overturned with a resounding crash of glass, catching the soldier in its fall, precipitating him to his hands and knees.

The fighting blood of my sturdy Norse father raced through my veins, filling me with the lust for battle. I shot out of my retreat and, striking wildly, found the soft face of Diego, into which my fist sank sufficiently. He went down heavily to the pavement of the courtyard. Madness seized me again, and I laughed aloud.

The soldier was up again. I took his glancing blow upon the shoulder and gave him all I had with one straight right, then I turned to face the last adversary, Francisco, but his long arm came down swiftly, and a pistol in his hand struck my unprotected head. The trees and the hanging lamp and the moon disappeared in a crimson sea. I groped blindly, and found friendly hands that let me down gently to the flagstones.

CHAPTER II

The Santa Lucrecia

I lived in a land of dreams, of grotesque fancies, where formless figures moved in silent aimlessness through half-transparent fog. I heard the vaguest echo of a voice, the fragment of a song, the shuffling of footsteps. Morning sunlight, streaming through a narrow, slatted port-hole, stenciled a flaming pattern on the wall above my head. I was in a cabin of a ship, for I saw the heavy beams that held the floor of the afterdeck, and I heard the gentle creak of blocks. I felt a painful throbbing in my head and, raising a hand, touched a bandage.

A figure moved in the cabin, approached and leaned over me. About the face so near my own there was a sort of unreal malformation. One of the eyes was closed, the liver-colored nose was larger by far than any nose should be, and a crooked grin pulled the features all awry.

"Is that a real face," I asked, "or have you, too, just returned from a bal masque?"

Whereupon the face swore a bitter Spanish oath, and I knew the owner of it for the soldier. Now the tall form of Francisco bent over me. "Then you didn't shoot me in the garden of the good Diego, nor drop me in the river?"

Smiling, he shook his head. "No; however, Manuel was for slipping a knife between your ribs."

"Is Manuel he of the dark face that resembles a bad dream?"

"Yes, Senor." He chuckled. "His face is even worse now—if such could be." He thought a moment. "You fight, Senor, as though you love to fight."

"Not at all; though sometimes, it is true that the blood of my father speaks to me."

"If Venezuela had a thousand men like you, Senor," he said, and the flame of the patriot burned in his eyes, "she would win her independence out of hand." I found nothing to say to this, and he went on, deep anxiety in his eyes: "In your unconsciousness, Senor, you spoke often to 'Her Majesty,' who seems to possess shining black curls and purple moonlight in her eyes. Can we have made so vast a blunder?"

Now, in spite of the torture of my wounded head, I laughed—and groaned, and laughed again. "The majesty, Senor, of the lady of my dreams, lies only in her beauty; I saw her coming from a bal masque, and she was garbed as a queen. You have taken no prince incognito—only an American who has spent one mad night." I knew that they would have killed me after our fight if they had intended to kill me at all, so I assumed that, for the present at least, I was safe. "Where do we go, Francisco, and what, may I ask, are your plans concerning me?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Historic Holy Ground of Jefferson Barracks

When a commanding site on the high bluffs overlooking the Mississippi river was chosen for the military post of Jefferson Barracks, at St. Louis, in 1826, at the same time was acquired the adjoining bluff, which has become one of the most beautiful national cemeteries in the entire United States. It is a setting with its panoramic view of the majestic river below, and the gently rolling hills covered with lofty forest trees in the background that is surpassed by none of the military cemeteries in which lie the honored dead of the nation.

It is an artistic spot and hallowed by the graves of 14,000 soldiers who have had some part in every war or Indian skirmish ever engaged in by American forces. The records of their lives tell the military history of the United States. It has been a national cemetery, however, only since 1863, when it was so created as a burial place for veterans of the Civil war. During those discordant years, 9,824 soldiers were buried there, of which 1,104 were Confederate prisoners of war.

The cemetery was started as the burial ground for the army post of Jefferson Barracks, and in that capacity was used not only for soldiers stationed there, but for the members of their families also. It happens thus that the first grave to be placed on the bluff was that of a young girl, Eliza Ann Leah, who was buried there in 1827.

Fragrant Foliage

Plants with fragrant foliage were popular years ago. The leaves were picked, dried and used for various purposes, scattered through the linen in bureau drawers and for scenting ribbon boxes and other things. Lemon verbena was a favorite, rose geranium and other scented geraniums were also used. Then after the bottle was well packed with the petals, alcohol was added to completely cover them, which made a delicately flavored perfume.

A Far Better External Remedy

No matter how up to date your doctor is, there is one old-fashioned remedy he often finds most helpful—the mustard plaster. For generations it has been recognized as useful in treating bad colds, particularly where pneumonia is feared. But today many physicians realize that there is something far better in the way of external treatment, giving results never before obtained. It is B. & M., The Penetrating Germicide. For quickly checking coughs and colds it is always dependable. Should always be used where pneumonia threatens or has set in. B. & M. is the only germicide that penetrates when externally applied. There is nothing else like it, no substitute for it. Your druggist should have it in stock. Or we will mail a full-size bottle on receipt of $1.25 and his name. Useful booklet free. F. E. CRITIC STIRRED BY MISUSE OF WORDS

A thing of which I become frightfully tired is the so frequent misuse in popular writing—at times excellent writing—of the words "infinite" and "infinity" and "infinitely" and "infinitesimal," John O'Ren complains, in the Baltimore Sun. How often one author is said to have produced a book "infinitely better" than some other book. How often a sum of 3 cents is called "an infinitesimal amount." How often somebody speaks of the "infinite complexity" of the world's problems at this juncture. And so on. It is really very dreadful. I do not propose to try to discuss the infinite and infinity at this point. I know, for one thing, that I am not a person prepared to do it. But I do know that most times these words are used with utmost carelessness.

There is, of course, no such thing as a book "infinitely better" than another book, or an "infinitesimal" sum of cents. And to seize upon a concept which is at the same time one of the more difficult and one of the most awesome, depending upon whether one regards it intellectually or emotionally, and make use of it as if it were a simple term like "very" or "much" is appalling.

Infinity is one thing I do not think we can afford to be loose or nonchalant about. To toss it about recklessly, even as a word, is shocking to one's sense of values. And in my own case I always make up my mind that a critic who talks about "infinitely better than" is simply a critic whose most humble judgment is not to be trusted.

Makes You Lose Unhealthy Fat

Mrs. Ethel Smith of Norwich, Conn., writes: "I lost 16 lbs. with my first bottle of Kruschen. Being on night duty it was hard to sleep days but now since I am taking Kruschen I sleep plenty, eat as usual and lose fat too."

To take off fat—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water every morning before breakfast—an 85 cent bottle lasts 4 weeks—Get it at any drug store in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the easiest, surest and safest way to lose fat your money gladly returned.

Fish Had His Watch

Leonard Smith, of Calcamonga, Calif., went deep-sea fishing. He missed his watch and thought perhaps he had left it home. Smith caught a good-sized bass. An hour later he picked up the fish to clean it and thought he felt its heart beating. Slitting open the fish he found his watch still ticking away.

Unimportant

"John, my sister Lucy's getting married. What shall we give her for a wedding present?"

"Does she really love the man?"

"Of course."

"Then most anything will do."

Planting Asparagus

Asparagus roots should be planted about six inches deep in rows four or five feet apart and the plants two feet apart in the row. The first year the roots are not covered the full depth of six inches, but about three inches of soil is put over them and as cultivation proceeds through the year the trench will be filled up in the fall. Asparagus needs plenty of fertilizer and will do fairly well in many soils that receive sufficient moisture during the growing season.

Keep Eggs Clean

"Considerable saving can be affected during the spring months by keeping the nests clean and the eggs from becoming soiled," declares E. R. Menefee of the Purdue university market department. Menefee points out that dirty eggs cost the farmer and poultryman from one to three cents per dozen because of the low grade into which they are classified. In the spring, when the birds are turned out on to wet ground, dirty eggs are more likely to occur.

There is something about homegrown fruit that is different—something that makes it taste so much better than any you could obtain anywhere else.

Reward for Large Families

Rewarding parents of large families is one of the most brilliant functions that take place annually at the Hotel de Ville, Paris. Nearly 150 medals of gold, silver and bronze, according to the merits of each case, were this year distributed. The gold medals went to the parents of eleven and twelve offspring, silver to those of eight or nine, and bronze to those of five, six or seven. There were nine of the gold class this year, twenty-one of the silver and more than one hundred bronze ones presented.

One spoonful in water neutralizes many times its volume in stomach acids, and at once. The symptoms disappear in five minutes.

You will never use crude methods when you know this better method. And you will never suffer from excess acid when you prove out this easy relief.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia prescribed by physicians for 50 years in correcting excess acids. 25c and 50c a bottle—any drug store.

The ideal dentifrice for clean teeth and healthy gums is Phillips' Dental Magnesia tooth-paste.

Venerable Earth

Geologists believe rain has fallen on earth for at least 1,500,000,000 years, says Dr. William Bowie of the United States coast and geodetic survey. The oldest sedimentary rocks, estimated to be 1,500,000,000 years old, could not have been formed without running water to wash sediments from land surfaces, he says.—Indianapolis News.

HONOR MAKERS OF VAST ZULU NATION

Fighting Race Recognizes the Deeds of Leaders.

Chaka, Mpande, Cetewayo, and Dinizulu, four famous zulu kings immortalized in the novels of Sir H. Ridger Haggard are commemorated by monuments erected by the Zulu nation.

Judged by their own code, they were great men, cruel, treacherous, ambitious of the warfare they waged. And greatest of all was Chaka.

Chaka, the Lion of the Zulus, founder of their military system, unequaled in all Africa, was the son of Senzangakona, chieftain of the Amazulu, a tribe of not more than 2,000 men, and a tributary of the Umtetwa people. The story of the Zulu ruling dynasty is one of merciless selfishness; if father or brother stood in ambition's path he was an enemy to be removed.

It was Dingiswayo who prepared the ground for Chaka's reorganization of the Umtetwa as a fighting race. Once he had been conducting a series of raids and had come into contact with white forces.

He had quickly realized the futility of the weapons of his people against those of his strange adversaries, and had retired. But he had gained valuable knowledge; he had perceived the deadly efficiency of a body of men acting in concert and to order. He resolved to reform.

On the death of Dingiswayo, Chaka rose to power. He welded the tribes of the country into the vast Zulu nation. His seat in the saddle of office was firm, the reins were drawn tightly and the bit gouged the mouth of the Zulu people.

His reorganization was immediate and far-reaching. His first move was to substitute for the long, unwieldy throwing spear the short stabbing assegai; "the nation who shortens her arms lengthens her boundaries." Then he created the famous impis, or regiments, each uniformed —one impi would bear white shields, a second black, a third would wear straw hats, a fourth leopard skins, and a fifth, the Bees, hummed like that insect when they charged into battle—and each living in villages apart.

The soldiers were fed on beef and beer to make them strong, and neither woman nor child was allowed near the barracks, for these, Chaka said, made man soft. In fact, a man was not allowed to marry until he had seen many years' service.

Because there are ugly things in this world, is no reason why we want to hear about them in every chapter. Novelists, take notice.

A Cold

Colds are common because people are careless. Prompt use of aspirin will always check a cold. Or relieve your cold at any stage. And genuine aspirin can't hurt you. Take two tablets of Bayer Aspirin at the first indication of a cold, and that's usually the end of it. If every symptom hasn't disappeared in a few hours, repeat. Bayer Aspirin does not depress the heart. Take enough to give complete relief. And if your throat is sore, dissolve three tablets in water and gargle away all soreness. In every package of genuine Bayer Aspirin are proven directions for colds, headaches, sore throat, neuralgia, neuritis. Millions who used to suffer from these things have found winter comfort in aspirin.

FLOUR and the RETAIL MERCHANT

THIS YEAR THERE IS AN OPPORTUNITY for North Dakota merchants to perform a great service for the farmers of this state by buying flour made from North Dakota spring wheat.

AS POINTED OUT IN PREVIOUS ADVERTISEMENTS in this series, continued sales of flour made from Southern wheats would force prices of spring wheat down. Spring wheat prices have declined 9c per bushel in the past two weeks.

IT IS ONLY BY CLOSE CO-OPERATION BETWEEN the retail merchants and their customers that it will be possible to prevent further declines in spring wheat prices.

In the manufacture of DAKOTA MAID FLOUR we use only the choicest of North Dakota spring wheat. You help both your State and yourself when you use DAKOTA MAID FLOUR.

Push-The-Button Meals

THIS is a push-the-button age wherein it is possible to have anything from a Western Union boy to an in-a-door bed by merely pushing a button or turning a crank. If you live in New York City you can even go into a restaurant, drop a coin in the slot and have boiling coffee and cooling cream pour simultaneously into your waiting cup.

The modern woman keeps pace by devoting a shelf in her pantry to push-the-button meals. This doesn't mean that she has pigeon-holed the old-time good things that take a day to cook. There are days just meant for chopping and grinding and blending mincemeat, say, to be later piled into flaky crusts that melt in your mouth and tell the world that you have baked an honest-to-goodness home-made pie.

Presto! Dinner's Served

But there are days, too, when people drop in, or you go out, returning home with only time, figuratively speaking, to push-the-button. Then the shelf of prepared foods is a life-saver. What does it hold in store? There are Italian dinners with meat sauce that takes a day to cook, already cooked in the can; Mexican dinners that require only that the chili con carne be heated and poured over hot tamales in the Mexican manner; and an endless list of American favorites such as corned beef hash that needs only browning in the oven and the possible addition of a poached egg; oven-baked beans which have cooked for hours with pork, brown sugar and molasses and need only a minute to heat; fruits already mixed for salads ready to be hurried into lettuce nests, and delicious berries, ready for sponge layers and a topping, perhaps, of hastily-beaten cream.

These are only a few of the foods that can be prepared while the kettle boils—to our grandmothers they would truly be push-the-button meals.*

The American Red Cross in Action

Above—Red Cross paid the grocery bill, and maintained the health and morale of more than two million drought sufferers. Balanced rationing and ample provisions prevailed. The Red Cross commanded the services of thousands of volunteers. It was an impressive demonstration of neighbors helping neighbors. At right—Hot lunches for school children in the drought area.

Colorful and strange is a field trip out of Manila. The native napa house is a real home that warmly welcomes the Red Cross nurse.

Bits of cheer at Christmas time—80,000 boxes spread good will and happiness round the world. An important phase of Junior activities.

Men's classes are popular features of Home Hygiene and Care of the Sick.

The American Red Cross was founded in 1881. It is, by Presidential proclamation, the National Relief Agency. It is chartered by Congress, headed by the President of the United States, and supported by annual memberships.

These memberships make possible a program which includes:

Disaster Relief—1,000 catastrophes in 50 years—all the way from Johnstown flood to Drought.

Veterans—380,000 social and financial problems in a year for ex-service men and their families and for the men of the regular Army and Navy.

First Aid—73,000 certificates awarded in a year—the answer to the annual toll of 100,000 deaths from accident.

Life-Saving—70,000 candidates pass tests in year—one way to prevent the 7,000 drownings now occurring each year.

Public Health Nursing—1,340,000 visits to patients in 12 months—building health in home, school, and community.

Home Hygiene—568 Chapters conducting this work—teaching the family how to care for sickness.

Nutrition — 138,000 children and adults taught in year—better food and better bodies.

Junior Red Cross—7,000,000 school children enrolled—spreading cheer and good will round the world.

Insular and foreign activities—aided in 12 disasters last year.

Volunteers—110,000 in one year—ever ready in war and in peace.

Says Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes: "The American Red Cross represents the united voluntary effort of the American people in the ministry of mercy. It is the best and most effective expression of the American heart."

The annual party for disabled veterans on the lawn of the White House. President Hoover who is also president of the American Red Cross is interested in all phases of Red Cross service to both the sound and the well among soldiers, sailors, marines, veterans and their families.

Water Safety methods, as taught by the Red Cross, prevent many needless deaths from drowning.

Currants from Greece were used in these cookies baked by Juniors and served in school lunches in drought areas. There are 12,000,000 Juniors in the world, bound together by mutual understanding and ideals.

4-H Club to Meet

The Holt 4-H Club will meet at the Sunnyside schoolhouse 3 miles east of Holt on Friday evening, Nov. 20th, at 8 p. m.

The Club will organize for the coming year and new members are asked to come and join. Let us all turn out and make this a rousing big meeting and organize one of the largest clubs in the county.

The local club did some splendid work the past year and made a grand showing at the county fair where they won several big prizes. The club held their annual achievement day here recently and a crowd of several hundred people attended the big program and saw the club members demonstrate their skill at exhibiting their projects.

Again one of the members made an outstanding showing by winning one of the four free trips to the Junior Livestock Show at St. Paul offered by the county to winners in the beef calf project. The lucky boy was Lewis Sagstuen. His calf was sold at the show for $110,00.

By solid cooperation from the people of this community we know that the club can be made one of the most outstanding in the county, and will be able to sponsor many more projects for coming year than in the past.

There is open choice for whatever project a member may want to take up, and the more projects that can be sponsored the better the club will be and a wider range of interest will be created.

Make your plans now to attend this meeting on the date mentioned above and bring a new member to take part for the coming year.

The 4-H club is one of the best organizations in the county and everybody should get behind the local boys and girls and help them with their various projects and boost for the club a 100 per cent at all times.

Commercial Club Meeting

The members of the Commercial Club will please meet at the Bank offices Monday evening, Nov. 16 at 7.30 for a short business meeting.

Rousing Time Had at Pep-Fest

What we believe to be the largest and peppiest crowd of local people to gather here this year, was in attendance on Friday evening when the Holt Commercial Club staged their annual pep fest for the farmers of this community.

A big progrom had been arranged for the occasion with a lot of good numbers.

E. O. Nybbaken, supt. of the local school spoke for the local businessmen and welcomed the farmers and their wives.

Out of town speakers who took part in the program were: Wm. Dahlquist and Paul Lundgren of Thief River Falls, P. L. Anderson, Crookston and E. M. Evans of Middle River.

Several musical and vocal numbers were given by the local male quartette and others.

After the program lunch was served with an extra treat of cigars for the men and candy for the ladies. When the lunch hour was over the crowd went to the community hall where they had a get-to-gether dance.

Death of Mrs. Waagedahl

Mrs. E. O. Waagedahl, who had been very ill at a hospital in Thief River Falls the past two weeks since giving birth to a child, passed away there late Wednesday evening from complications caused by stomach flu.

Funeral rites will be conducted on Saturday from the home at 1 p. m., with Rev. O.J. Haukeness officiating.

Cow-Testing

Do you want your cows tested? H. C. McMurray, the pioneer cow-tester of Minnesota, will test them for you for $1.20 per cow per year and if you don't have the cash will accept grain for pay. Bring your samples to the creamery once a month.

I will furnish sample bottles, herd books and all that is needed except a milk scale.

What Quality Cream Means

The following was taken from "Hoard's Dairyman" of October 25, 1931, and gives a mighty good idea of the value of cleanliness and proper feeding and handling methods in the production of Land O'Lakes foods.

"To Land O'Lakes Sweet Cream Butter (produced by Land O'Lakes Crym., Inc.) goes the honor of being the first butter to bear the 'accepted' seal of the Committee on Foods of the American Medical Association."

Such a distinction is one the Farmers of Minnesota can feel justly proud of, knowing that they have produced a food accepted as the highest standard of fine quality foods.

Good Health Is Your Natural State

But you can't expect to enjoy good health if you are allowing disease germs to accumulate and multiply somewhere in your system. Coughs, colds, bronchitis, tonsilitis, rheumatism and often neuritis are the work of disease organisms which must be attacked and destroyed if good health is to be restored. These and many other more serious types of infection may be controlled and good health restored by chemically destroying the germs, using B. & M., The Penetrating Germicide, to stop the bacterial poisoning. The B. & M. treatment is unlike any other—quick and positive in action. Your druggist should have B. & M. in stock. If he fails to supply you promptly, send us his name and $1.25 and we will mail you a full-size bottle. Helpful booklet free on request. F. E. Rollins Co., 53 Beverly St., Boston, Mass. (Adv.)

COMFORT for COLICKY BABIES

. . . THROUGH CASTORIA'S GENTLE REGULATION

The best way to prevent colic, doctors say, is to avoid gas in stomach and bowels by keeping the entire intestinal tract open, free from waste. But remember this: a tiny baby's tender little organs cannot stand harsh treatment. They must be gently urged. This is just the time Castoria can help most. Castoria, you know, is made specially for babies and children. It is a pure vegetable preparation, perfectly harmless. It contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics. For years it has helped mothers through trying times with colicky babies and children suffering with digestive upsets, colds and fever. Keep genuine Castoria on hand, with the name:

THE STORY

At nightfall, in the old city of New Orleans, in the year 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him. Afterward he learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde flees from gens d'armes, taking refuge in a garden, where he overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered, recovering consciousness to find himself a prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, Spanish ship bearing contraband arms and ammunition for the Venezuelans under Bolivar.

—3—

"We go to La Guaira," said Francisco solemnly, "and there, God willing, we join forces with Simon Bolivar, who will be, some day, the savior of his country, just as your own George Washington was."

"A thing," said I, "which I hope will come to pass, for the western world should be free of Spain, and will be, some day, I am sure. That, however, interests me less at this moment than my safe return to New Orleans, where my father and my mother will be waiting for me."

"You think, then," Francisco urged, "that, for certain compensation, you could not add to the experiences of your life by joining—?"

"Compensation? My father, Senor, is the richest man in the lower valley. What can a campaign in Venezuela add to my life? I have spent two years with Gen. Andrew Jackson."

"Yet we cannot set you free, Senor, you know too much."

"You cannot hold me."

Francisco smiled. "We have arranged it. You are mad; a violent insanity has possessed you, and the good Doctor Santini, whom, in one of your fits of madness, you have already attacked, must attend you at all times. We are taking you to your home near Caracas."

"You have told the captain all that?"

"Assuredly; it was gentler by far than dropping you into the river, for our plans must not go astray."

"Bah!" I cried. "Suppose I get word to the captain that the coils of tobacco conceal firearms, that the kegs of tobacco are powder, that the corn contains bullets, and that machetes may be found in the pork?

Francisco laughed softly, while Santini swore out of the side of his mouth. "If you managed to get such word to Captain Alvarez, Senor, and he should look and find nothing, he will be assured that you are mad; if he should find contraband he would have no proof against us, for shipment has been made in proper form from Diego Martinez to another merchant in Caracas. If the captain questions our innocence, and even becomes so suspicious as to confine us, pending examination at Caracas, there is yet Manuel and the mixed crew of this ship. We cannot do things by halves. Only Spanish ships may trade with Venezuela, therefore we put them to our use."

I marveled at the daring of the thing, and marveling, I was filled with admiration. "Simon Bolivar must depend upon you greatly, Senor," I said.

Francisco bowed. "He has offered me that signal honor, and you may rest assured that nothing shall swerve me from my service to him and, through him, my service to Venezuela. One life, Senor, or a score of lives, shall not stand in my way. We brought you alive to this ship instead of killing you as we should have done because I harbored a faint hope that a man of your courage might see his way clear to aid us, but as you cannot offer service I shall see to it that you do not interfere."

"I think, of the two of us, Francisco, the charge of madness should not be laid against me!"

The days went by, slowly enough, while the Santa Lucrecia skimmed the quiet waters of the Gulf, and my head healed, and the face of Santini became less like that of a gargoyle.

We touched at Vera Cruz, where a letter I had written to my father and mother was posted, a letter telling them that I had gone to Venezuela with friends, and would return to New Orleans at a later date. This, I knew, would relieve their worry over my non-arrival from France.

At Coatzacoalcos, in the tranquil harbor of which we spent a night, the wily Francisco offered me a chance to escape, but, having experienced a change of heart, I refused to take advantage of it, for I had heard a voice in the night—a voice as clear and as pure as the note of a mocking bird. It brought back to me remembrance of all the mad things of that wild New Orleans night. That voice had transformed the Santa Lucrecia from a prison ship into a paradise.

As the days and nights went by I listened for her footsteps on the afterdeck; I pictured again and again the exquisite face in its frame of dark curls, the soft curve of her cheek, the sweetly pointed chin, and I lost myself in the immeasurable depths of eyes that could change to purple the silver glory of moonlight.

One night I heard her voice lifted in an old French song that I knew and loved, and one that my mother used to sing.

Francisco and Santini were out. I tried the door and found, to my great surprise, that it was unsecured, for they had been in the habit of locking me in. I slipped out, my heart thudding in my throat, and seeking the protecting shadow of the mizzenmast, crouched, listening, looking.

Scarce thirty feet away she stood beside the starboard after-rail, a golden-tan mantilla over her hair and across her slim shoulders. Her face was raised toward the stars, and the music that came from her lips was such as I had always imagined the angels might produce.

A slim boy, Polito, was near her, and on her right stood the massive figure that I had last seen dressed as Charles V. One of his arms was strapped against his side. His rasping voice broke into the middle of the melody: "Why do you sing in French, Carisima; is not the Spanish language sufficient?"

"No one language, 'Dolfo, is sufficient for a night like this. Every language has its own love songs, never does a translation quite suffice."

I found myself laughing softly in the gloom. She would sing a love song in French to her Spanish lover! Even Polito was laughing now. "Adolfo," he said in gentle raillery, "console thyself that she does not sing in English, which might bring to her mind the moon-madness of that tall Americano with the fair hair and the clever wrist."

Adolfo uttered something in his beard that must have been an oath, for her voice was gently chiding: "Poor 'Dolfo, he has had an evil time, and we should be good to him during this, his first hour on the deck. I think the Americano must have had a touch of the moon, which does amazing things to us. I suppose he is laughing, somewhere, over the madness of that night."

"Unless," said De Fuentes lamely, "there have been other nights."

Now I wanted to deny that; I wanted to tell her that her image had filled my dreams. I had a wild desire to cast myself at her feet and to cry my love aloud to the world, yet I knew that such an act of insanity would only add confirmation to Francisco's charge of madness against me.

While I waited, hot and cold by turns, listening to her voice and devouring her with eager eyes, two figures came along the rail and stopped. The taller one, Francisco, bowed, and Adolfo jerked his heavy body awkwardly. When she spoke to Francisco and Santini there was an easy frankness in her manner, as though she had been in the habit of talking with them often.

"That mysterious patient of yours, Doctor Villard," she said, "has filled me with a consuming curiosity; is it forbidden that I satisfy it?"

Santini laughed uneasily, and Francisco answered her: "It has been ordered, Senorita, that our patient be left in the strictest privacy. His people in Caracas will hold us—"

Now De Fuentes laughed, laughed harshly, laughed long and loud, a huge guffaw that beat out over the quiet sea. "Caracas," he cried, "how will you two reach Caracas?"

"Ah, Adolfo," she said, "what do you mean; has the close confinement, and the pain of your wound—?"

"No," Adolfo yelled, "a hundred noes!" He went off into another paroxysm of unholy glee, in which I fervently hoped he might expire of apoplexy, but he survived. "Doctor Villard," he jeered, "Doctor Villard indeed! He is Santini, the soldier—and Bolivar is going to lose a patriot! And as for you, Francisco Perez, there will be a rope—"

Francisco emitted a shrill whistle, and figures, running swiftly, emerged from the gloom. I dashed toward the milling group, caught sight of Santini, with a knife upraised, and threw myself upon him. The evil blade clattered to the deck and the soldier turned to face me. He rasped a bitter oath, swinging his fists the while, which crashed against the side of my head and filled the heavens with shooting stars. Before Santini could strike again the lithe form of Polito intervened. He threw his slim body like a lance at the soldier's throat and the two went down, a grotesque figure of writhing arms and legs.

Now I saw the dark Manuel, a pistol is his hand and his mouth open in an expectant grin. Before he could raise the weapon I closed his mouth with a driving fist, behind which I had put all the power of my muscles.

With the sailors pressing around us I turned to find Francisco. There was no enmity in his eyes, and he made no move to attack me. "Francisco," I said in one of those sudden, unaccountable hushes that every battle, large or small, will develop, "you have committed a grave blunder."

Trembling hands caught my arm and whirled me around. The Senorita Lamartina raised on tiptoe, and her pale face was less than eight inches from my eyes.

"Your—Your Majesty," I faltered.

"Mother of G—d," she whispered, "the moon-wraith!"

* * * * * * *

A western sun filled the upper half of my tiny cubicle with a lurid glow, a still, oppressive heat—presaging a storm—bore upon me; bonds that cut me cruelly held my arms and legs, and black thoughts of injustice filled my brain.

I had fought to save him—and her—and I had come to this prison cell. Was this the Spaniard's idea of gratitude; could there be in the heart of Adolfo de Fuentes so perverted a sense of right and wrong, in his plan of life so poor a picture of sportsmanship? Ah, I was to learn many things about the Spaniards.

I wondered what had become of Manuel; I wondered what they had done to Francisco and Santini, for I remembered that Spanish justice was swift.

But one ray of light showed in the gloom of my despair. Riding upon that fervent whisper of the "moon-wraith!" had come, so I believed, a definite note of joy. . . .

I heard the grating of a key in the padlock, and the rattle of a chain. The door opened and two armed sailors came in. They loosed my bonds and I stood up, moving my arms and legs so that the numbness passed away. The sailors eased out in single file and stationed themselves in the channel, guns ready for any attempt that I might make to escape.

I stood wondering, eyes upon the uneven floor, until the consciousness of a presence came to me. I was afraid to raise my eyes until I heard her voice—and there has never been another voice like hers, never another face so exquisite, nor a form so graciously fashioned.

"Will the Senor Moon-wraith—?"

Now a palsy seized me. I was afraid—afraid that I was dreaming. I heard her light step as she crossed the narrow way, and I felt the touch of a tentative hand upon my arm. I raised my eyes and drank deep of the beauty of her face.

"Senorita," I said, "ah, Senorita, you have come thus to my poor prison."

She turned her head and glanced over her shoulder, where in the gloom of the channel, dim outlines of the sailor guards were visible. "Monsieur, you know the French?"

"Perfectly," I said; "it is my mother tongue."

"Your mother tongue? I thought you were Americano."

"Yes; though my mother is French."

Standing close to me she raised her face toward the glow of the tiny porthole. "Will you tell me, Monsieur, who you are?"

Tell her? I would tell her anything, anything to hold her here, to give me further time to fill my eyes with her loveliness and my soul with the joy of her presence. "My name is Loren."

"Loren," she repeated, accenting—as she should have done—the last syllable, "Loren—what?"

"Loren Garde, the good Norse name that my father, a youth just out of his teens, brought to New Orleans after his campaign under the brilliant Gen. Nathaniel Greene. With faith in himself and the new nation to which he had offered valiant service, he has managed by hard work and careful saving and investment to gather vast acreage of Mississippi valley lands."

"If your father is wealthy, then why—in the name of all the saints, Monsieur—did you thus throw away your life by serving that arch-rebel and conspirator, Simon Bolivar?"

Now a bit of Francisco's patriotism touched me, so that I refrained, for the moment, from telling her that I had spurned the offer of the revolutionists. "The rebel of today, Your Majesty, may be tomorrow's liberator. Do you not know that, already, they are calling this Bolivar the Washington of South America?"

Women's Hands Larger Than Ancestors'

The hands of the women of today—are they larger than the hands of their grandmothers? There is no exposition of old-style costume, says the Matin of Paris, which does not reveal, at least by the diminutive gloves, the exquisite smallness of our feminine predecessors, both living and extinct. Few women of this generation, moreover, are able to wear the wedding rings, the other rings or bracelets of their ancestors.

One is able to conclude, certainly, that these souvenirs of the past were chosen in accordance with the fashion and requirement, and not merely curious legacies left to us as something most precious and most rare.

It would be only honesty, rather, to avow that the activity of modern women has done away with much of the delicate slenderness of former times. The hand which controls the flying machine and which wields the racket and the oar cannot, of course, remain as small and graceful as the one which had but to hold a handkerchief of lace.

AUTO WINS ITS WAY IN EASTERN LANDS

The automobile has recently made two more conquests in out-of-the-way parts of the world. Our State department has just recognized the government of Ibn Saud, king of Hejaz and sultan of Nejd and divers other tracts of the Arabian desert. Ibn controls the sacred place of Mecca, and it seems that Moslem pilgrims who formerly journey thither by caravan now prefer to travel by auto bus, much to the scandal of the holy men and the discomfiture of the camel drivers. In diplomatic circles it is calculated that our recognition of the picturesque Arab potentate will stimulate the sale of American automobiles in the land of the prophet.

Meanwhile the dalai lama, head of the monastic hierarchy that rules Tibet, has ordered a "devil wagon" from India for his private and royal use, all of which is in defiance of the 15,000-odd monks who constitute the governing caste of the country. The story goes that the grand lama previously owned another car, but the other priests objected so vigorously to it that he soon locked it up in a mule stall in the monastery, where it succumbed to the ravages of rust.

The magnitude of such an innovation may be understood when one realizes that the machine age in Tibet has largely been limited to the prayer wheels in which the 15,000-odd monks grind out their incantations.

BIG RESULTS FROM LITTLE IRON RING

One hundred years ago, on August 29, 1831, the son of an Irish blacksmith, who from youth had been fascinated by the mysteries of magnetism and electricity, took an iron ring, wound around it two coils of wire, attached the end of one coil to an electric battery, that of the other to a galvanometer and watched to see what would happen. On the galvanometer the indicator needle moved.

In that experiment the modern world of the dynamo was born; it evolved from the little iron ring in the hands of Michael Faraday, whose brilliant mind had conceived the theory of induction. In a century an industry worth at least $100,000,000,000 has been built upon the coiled wires and their iron core; a beneficial revolution has been worked in the domain of industry; Niagara and 10,000 other cataracts have been linked to the tasks of civilization; light—for the pressure of a button—has been put at the command of man and the dark corners of the earth have been made luminous. The National Electric Light association recently reported to President Hoover that its members would spend $600,000,000 this year in new construction. Wheels revolve in factories, trolley cars move human masses from homes to work and work to homes, smokeless locomotives haul trains across country; in the household are vacuum cleaners, dish-washers, clothes-washers and what not; on the farm cows are milked and other chores are done with far less of human labor, because a century ago Faraday had an idea.

Probably no more impressive measure may be found of the accelerated progress of civilization than in contemplating what has developed in 100 years from Faraday's iron ring.

Firestone PATENTED CONSTRUCTION gives Extra Strength and Safety

THE Firestone Oldfield Type Tire is a tough, rugged tire all the way through.

Inside are the special patented construction features of Gum-Dipping and Two Extra Cord Plies Under the Tread that give the body of the tire extra strength and safety.

Outside is a thick tread of slow-wearing, non-oxidizing rubber with a deep non-skid for long, trouble-free service and sure traction. Sturdy blocks of rubber on the sidewall guard against rut and curb wear.

Compare this great tire with any Special Brand Mail Order Tire selling at the same price. Firestone Service Dealers have sections for you to inspect.

Drive to the Firestone Service Dealer near you and see for yourself why Firestones give longer trouble-free service and greater safety.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of $1157.20, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by John W. Eells and Edith Eells, his wife, Mortgagors, to Chistopher Graham, Mortgagee, bearing date the 22nd day of April, 1926, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., in Book 111 of Mortgages, on page 254, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage or any part thereof.

NOW, THEREFORE, NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The Southwest Quarter (SW¼) of Section Eight (8), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty (40) West, of the Fifth Principal Meridian, containing 160 acres, according to the United States Government Survey thereof, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Marshall County at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren, in said County and State, on the 12th day of December, 1931, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of $1157.20, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and $50.00 Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Our advice to the public is to patronize the business places that advertise in the home paper. The home paper does more than any other influence for the upbuilding and general good of a community. Even if advertising were absolutely without merit in itself, the man who advertises must be considered as willing to do his share for the welfare of the community, while the one who does not advertise must expect to be considered as not caring, to say the least. But advertising has merit in itself. The advertiser dares not mistate the facts or misrepresent his goods; if he did, advertising would injure instead of helping his business. The man who advertises is willing to do something to get your patronage; he is willing to give you a bargain and want you to know it.

This makes it appear that the man who does not advertise, regardless of what business he is in, is simply looking for a chance to get a crack at your pocketbook and is unwilling to do anything to make it wort your while to spend your money with him.

The argument that steady advertising does not pay has gone flat. Let the people know what you have to sell them. Think this one over.

Held Annual Meeting

The Congregation of the Nazareth Lutheran church and the Nazareth Ladies Aid held their annual meeting in the church on Wednesday evening and one of the largest gatherings of church people to ever come in for a meeting this kind was in attendance that night. Several quite important matters were discussed and new officers elected for both the church council and the ladies aid.

Next week we will publish a complete directory of the church board and ladies aid.

The local pastor wishes to express his thanks to all of those who attended the meeting and everyone who has done their share as pledged to sustain the church in our community.

H. O. Hanson and family vited at the W. Rux home Friday evening.

The Weather

So far this fall we have enjoyed some exceptionally fine weather and we believe that more work has been accomplished during the late season than for many years.

On Monday morning the thermometer registered 45 above, but that was the last warm day this week, as on Tuesday it wasdown to 20 above and has been staying around that mark since. The ground has begun to freeze so plowing and such must stop soon However, if we should be lucky enough to have it freeze up while so nice and dry, we would have the best roads for winter driving that have ever been here.

Ferne Davis Waagedahl

Funeral rites were held on Saturday for Mrs. E. O. Waagedahl, with services at the home and in the Immanuel church in Ringbo.

Ferne Davis Waagedahl was born in Dallas county, Iowa, December 22, 1902. In 1904 her parents moved to Monroe county, Missouri. At the age of 13 she united with the Baptist church at Mexico, Missouri.

In 1918 the family moved to Minnesota where she had resided until the time of her death, November 11, 1931.

In June, 1929, she was united in marriage to Elling O. Waagedahl.

She leaves to mourn her loss her husband and an infant daughter, Betty Elaine, her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. T. R. Davis, and one sister, Leona, and a host of relatives and friends.

Rev. O.J. Haukeness officiated and interment was made in the Ringbo cemetery.

Mrs. Carl O. Syverson

Rev. Redal conducted funeral services at Strathcona on Wednesday for Mrs. Carl O. Syverson.

Mrs. Syverson was born in Aurland, Norway, October 5, 1879 and was at the time of her death 52 years old.

She leaves to mourn her loss her husband, three daughters, and one son; her aged parents, Mr. and Mrs. Lars Underdahl; seven sisters and brothers, and a host of relatives and friends.

Card of Thanks

We hereby wish to thank our friends and neighbors for the kindness shown us during the illness and death of our wife, daughter, sister, niece, cousin and aunt.

We also wish to thank the Holt Quartet for the songs rendered, Rev. Haukeness for his words of sympathy and comfort, and Mrs. Haukeness for the beautiful tribute. We are especially thankful for the beautiful flowers contributed.

A crowd of about three hundred people attended the last evening of the big sale at Gunheims store Saturday nite and lunch was served to everybody.

Ole Nybo Here on Visit

Ole Nybo of Hoople, N. Dak., arrived here on Tuesday to visit with friends and look after his real estate east of town. He had a little hard luck the evening he came here as when he went north on the range line four miles east of town to go up to the Carl Olson place, he hit the iron railing on the state road bridge and damaged his new Ford so badly that it had to be hauled in for repairs.

Parties Move In

Ted Nelson and a friend from Iowa have moved back on the old Nelson farm southwest of town. Lawrence Peterson and family whom had bought the farm from Mr. Nelson a year ago, sold it back to him recently and moved out west closer to Viking.

4-H Club to Meet

The Holt 4-H Club will meet at the Sunnyside schoolhouse 3 miles east of Holt on Friday evening, Nov. 20th, at 8 p. m.

The Club will organize for the coming year and new members are asked to come and join. Let us all turn out and make this a rousing big meeting and organize one of the largest clubs in the county.

What Quality Cream Means

The following was taken from "Hoard's Dairyman" of October 25, 1931, and gives a mighty good idea of the value of cleanliness and proper feeding and handling methods in the production of Land O'Lakes foods.

"To Land O'Lakes Sweet Cream Butter (produced by Land O'Lakes Crys., Inc.) goes the honor of being the first butter to bear the 'accepted' seal of the Committee on Foods of the American Medical Association."

Such a distinction is one the Farmers of Minnesota can feel justly proud of, knowing that they have produced a food accepted as the highest standard of fine quality foods.

A Cordial Welcome is Extended to All

A TRIBUTE TO FERNE DAVIS WAAGEDAHL

God took her home, He wanted her in Heaven,
He wished to spare her more of pain or care,
He called her home---to a better land in Heaven
And now she is waiting for us over there.

We loved her so! We find it hard to miss her!
She always had a ready smile and cheer,
And all about us seems less bright without her,
Her loving help we needed so much here.

But over there---in love and perfect beauty
She lives anew, awaiting loved ones all;
Then let us live in faith and hope and duty
That we may ready be for God's last call.

No parting there---no sorrow, pain or sadness,
No heavy hearts, no tears, no broken ties
There by His Grace. In reunited gladness
We'll meet again, because God's ways are wise.

Then let her rest as one who is but sleeping
A little while, to be awakened glad;—
Our souls content, although our eyes be weeping;
Our souls content, although our hearts are sad.

—Written by Mrs. O. J. Haukeness.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

SORE THROAT

FIVE minutes after you rub on Musterole your throat should begin to feel less sore! Continue the treatment once every hour for five hours and you'll be astonished at the relief.

This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

GENUINE PHILLIPS MILK OF MAGNESIA For Troubles due to Acid INDIGESTION ACID STOMACH HEARTBURN HEADACHE GASES-NAUSEA

WHEN FOOD SOURS

ABOUT two hours after eating many people suffer from sour stomachs. They call it indigestion. It means that the stomach nerves have been over-stimulated. There is excess acid. The way to correct it is with an alkali, which neutralizes many times its volume in acid.

The right way is Phillips' Milk of Magnesia—just a tasteless dose in water. It is pleasant, efficient and harmless. Results come almost instantly. It is the approved method. You will never use another when you know.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia prescribed by physicians for correcting excess acids. 25c and 50c a bottle—any drug store.

THE STORY

At nightfall, in the old city of New Orleans, in the year 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him. Afterward he learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde flees from gens d'armes, taking refuge in a garden, where he overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered, recovering consciousness to find himself a prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, Spanish ship bearing contraband arms and ammunition for the Venezuelans under Bolivar. On board are the conspirators he had overheard, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. An attempt to seize the ship fails.

She bowed her head, and the slim shoulders drooped. "I know, Monsieur, only that it touches me—here." She pressed her hands over her heart. "I—I do not understand."

"What have they done to Francisco Perez and Santini, the soldier?"

"We are approaching the shores of Venezuela," she said, "and tomorrow, as the sun rises—" She raised her hands and let them fall in a gesture of hopelessness. "I have tried to save them . . . I do not understand Adolfo; in some things he is hard—hard!"

I did not have to ask her what they intended to do with Loren Garde, who, as far as they knew, had cast his lot with the forces of revolution, who had hidden his identity behind the masquerade of insanity. I knew.

"What have they done with Manuel?"

"Manuel?" she questioned. "Ah—Manuel; he of the dark face and heavy shoulders. They have done nothing; he is free—a good sailor and a brave man though somewhat stupid."

Now I laughed, laughed until I saw a deep hurt in her eyes and her chin begin to tremble, then I stopped, apologetic. "Perhaps," said I, "my moon-madness has never quite forsaken me."

She had called Manuel stupid! What was it Francisco had said to me? Ah, yes . . . "If the captain questions our innocence, and even becomes so suspicious as to confine us, there is yet Manuel and the mixed crew of this ship." Surely, Francisco had not done things by halves. If courage and brains could win, Bolivar would never lose.

"If it helps you to laugh in the shadow of the gallows, Monsieur Garde, your moon-madness is a blessed gift." She turned away as though to leave me, but came back again. "I—I want you to know that I have tried so hard to save you, but I am helpless; I am not even a pawn in this tragedy they call the game of empire."

"May I crave a favor, Your Majesty—just one—before you go?"

"Surely." She raised her fair face questioningly. "If there is aught—?"

Now, while she kept her face upturned to me, I studied the smooth forehead, the high arch of eyebrow, the deep blue of her eyes, the quivering lips and the tender curve of cheek and chin.

"May I tell you that you are beautiful, and may I offer apology for having followed you, for having wounded your—your—for having wounded De Fuentes . . . and for that night of madness and terror in New Orleans? I wonder if you have imagined me crazy."

"It is not that, Monsieur; I do not understand. I think we cannot read America. That you should laugh at the gallows seems strange to me. And that you should have followed us from New Orleans. Is—is that the act of a sane man?"

"No, Your Majesty, it is not." Could I tell her of my mad worship, of that overwhelming love of mine; would that have gained anything for either of us? To have told her would merely have added to her unhappiness, for I had only a short night of life left to me.

"I am going to Adolfo," she said at last, "and tell him that the Senor Americano is not responsible, that the Venezuelans, Perez and Santini, held him captive. Adolfo will do much for me."

"But not that, Your Majesty, for Adolfo does not love me. He has every reason not to love me, for I have wounded him."

"I shall try, at least."

I knew she would fail, knew she would not return, so I tried every conversational subterfuge to detain her, with no success, for she extended a hand to me, smiling "Adios."

Even as I held the slim fingers, the sound of a pistol shot came from the deck above us, followed by the roar of a commanding voice.

"Captain Alvarez," she cried; "the voice of Captain Alvarez. What is it, Monsieur?"

Another shot, another yell; a shrill medley now, and swift, padding footsteps. Our guards disappeared in the gloom of the channel, running for the upper deck. The air was filled with the menace of an approaching storm as well as that of mutiny.

"What is it?" she screamed, holding to me. "What has happened, Senor, tell me?"

I laughed shortly. "The stupid Manuel is playing the game according to his orders. Unless something is done swiftly and well, this ship will be, very soon, in the hands of those who fight for Simon Bolivar. It is a floating arsenal, and is, therefore, a welcome prize for the revolutionists. We must act quickly."

"But you, Senor, are in the service—"

"Not at all; I have never served Francisco, nor Bolivar; only the Senorita—"

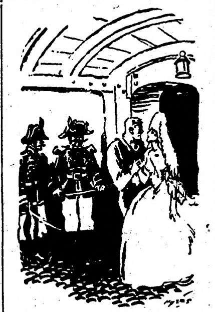
"Dulce," said she, completing my sentence.

Dulce! How prophetic had been that name, for it was at once a caress and a description. "Will you remain here, then, in safety, while I—?"

"No, Senor, no! I will go with you. There is Polito and—"

I knew she visualized Adolfo, but she did not call his name.

So, hand in hand we sped along the freight-cluttered channel. I led her to the companion ladder and half lifted her up through the quarter-deck hatch, from which position of vantage we were able to overlook the upper deck. It seemed at first deserted, but the report of a pistol came from the starboard rail abaft the mainmast, a shrill scream followed it, and a tall figure, lunging toward a slim boy whose body was braced against the bulwark, struck the rail, bent over it, and flopped back again to the deck, where he lay, grotesquely flattened. A puff of smoke wavered above the two figures.



"Perhaps," Said I, "My Moon-Madness Has Never Quite Forsaken Me."

"Mother of G—d," the Senorita breathed. "Polito! My brother has killed a man!"

Now other figures raced from the fore-deck and the forecastle; one of them, a heavy unwieldy figure with one bound arm, lifted a left hand and fired into the face of a sailor whose groping fingers, clutching wildly, found the throat of his adversary, and the two went down in a scrambling heap.

"Adolfo," cried the woman at my side, "Adolfo! Oh, the terror of this hour!"

"And the joy," I breathed, my soul atingle with the hope of freedom again.

"My brother," she gasped, "I must go to my brother!"

Well . . . as long as she didn't want to go to Adolfo.

The elements now had begun to add their fury to the storm of human hatred that already possessed the ship. I had seen these tropical storms before, and I knew that the greatest danger to the Santa Lucrecia lay not in the contending human forces on her deck but in the power of the approaching tempest.

I made my way in the rising tumult of the storm to the wheelhouse, which, as I had suspected, was empty. My puny efforts to bring the craft around were poor enough; yet I knew that, riding before the rushing wind, the plunging ship was due for certain disaster.

Gasping, I clung tenaciously to the straining wheel. The Santa Lucrecia, pitching prodigiously, dived into the body of a mountain of blue-green sea, and the mizzenmast came down with a note of rent timbers that lifted above the din of the storm. It fell aft, crushing the wheelhouse, but I had dived out of the path of its fall and, buffeted by the waters, had come up short against the low wall of the after-deck.

Clinging desperately to a stanchion, I wondered if there was another soul alive on board the ship, which was now only a plaything of the storm. Faintly came the sound of another rending crash, and I imagined that the foremast had gone, for the laboring vessel, after heeling perilously, whipped back to an even keel again.

While I crouched in the protection of the after-deck, the spirit of youth took hold of me, spoke to me—and the spirit of love also. She had come to see me, had glorified my prison, had let me feast my eyes upon the beauty of her face.

Spurred by a sudden resolve to find her, to save her, or to sink to the depths with her in my arms, I left my place of refuge and made my way by eccentric stages forward. I stumbled over a battened companion and rode the crest of a tumbling wave half the length of the deck. My outspread arms came in contact with a rail stanchion, and I held to it as the wave passed on.

In the piled-up masses of foam that beat over me I felt the clinging touch of a dress, my fingers found a slim arm, and I heard a shrill scream that rose above the roar of the tempest. The Senorita Dulce! In the semi-darkness she recognized me. A light of happiness took the place of the terror that had filled her eyes.

"Senor," she cried, the frail voice unconquered in the tumult, "I have been searching—"

I placed one arm around her, holding her close. "Are you afraid?"

"No," she said, smiling bravely, and smiling, fainted.

Well, it was better. So, holding her, I waited for the storm to destroy us. I drew an abiding consolation from the thought that, if the sea claimed us, I should have her all my own to the last instant of my life.

Even as I waited thus the great ship stopped suddenly, as though it had met an invisible wall. The stern lifted skyward, and the mainmast, sheared clean at the partners, fell forward, tearing a great gap in the rail. Now the stern went down again with a sickening lurch and the bowsprit pointed toward the boiling clouds.

While the Santa Lucrecia, balancing upon a submerged reef that had caught her amidships, teetered like a sparrow on a twig, the rain ceased as suddenly as it had come, and the wind abated somewhat, though it still blew half a gale.

With the aid of the stanchion and the rail, I got to my feet and, staggering under the burden of the Senorita Dulce, went forward slowly along the plunging deck toward four men who were working at the davits of a starboard boat. A tall figure of the four resembled Francisco, so I bent my steps toward the larboard rail, where another group showed in the fading twilight.

Polito's anxious smile was a ghastly thing, for one side of his face was smeared with blood. He took his sister in his arms and turned to place her in the boat. As he did so Adolfo swung upon me with a clubbed pistol. I tried to dodge the blow and failed. The barrel of the weapon grazed my head and sent me spinning, and the tilting deck slipped from under my feet. Stumbling, I reached futilely for things to stay my descent, rolled, went through a wide space in the rail that the falling foremast had made, and fell for what seemed to my half-dazed senses immeasurable distances.

The plunge into the raging sea revived me instantly. I have always been at home in the water, so the danger of drowning was remote. Wind and the waves carried me swiftly landward as the short tropical twilight faded into a starless gloom. A floating spar touched me and, holding to it for support, I waited.

In the murk a towering mass of darkness passed me, passed me silently, like a lifeless derelict riding before a storm. It passed on, and I was left alone in the turbulent sea, a prey to doubts, to bitter disappointments and vague fears.

I heard at last the sounds of contact of the lashing sea upon the land. It was not the booming note of breakers on a reef, nor yet the rasping hiss of waves that rode along a sloping beach; it was more like the rush of a mighty wind through the forest, whereat I wondered even more until a giant wave, receding, left me stranded in a tree. I held on while other waves rushed past and over me, held until the storm had spent its fury, until the water had subsided.

MOON'S EFFECT ON THINGS OF EARTH

Wireless Found on List It Influences.

Never quarrel with your wife whilst the moon is full!

That was a piece of advice given recently by one who has spent a great part of his life in smoothing out domestic differences.

Here is one instance in hundreds of age-old beliefs in the influence of the moon on the nature and the doings of man. Can there be any truth in them?

There are few superstitions not founded on a bedrock of fact if only we dig deep enough to discover it. There are, for instance, many practical considerations against passing under a ladder. It is unlucky for you if the ladder slips and falls on you, or if you happen to receive part of the contents of a pot of paint; it would be equally unlucky for the occupant of the ladder should you inadvertently brush against it, causing it to slip.

Superstitions dealing with the moon are found in every part of the world, and underlying them all is a belief that the moon has an influence upon the well-being not only of men, but of animals and plants. Most pagan religions have a moon goddess.

In considering the question, we cannot help being struck by the number of ways in which the moon affects our lives. It revolves round the earth in approximately twenty-eight days, and from the moon man derived the original twenty-eight-day month, divided into four weeks, one for each quarter. The moon is the main cause of the tides, and it may be millions of years since hairy ancestors of ours first noticed that the highest tides occur about the times of full and new moon, the lowest at the first and lest quarters.

Dogs, wolves and foxes bay the full moon, though no other bright light affects them in this way. Most animals are disturbed when the moon blots out the sun during an eclipse. The biggest catches of certain sea fish are made at times of the full moon. In the tropics one sea creature, a particular delicacy, comes to the surface in countless thousands during the full moon, and is seen at no other time. In some parts of the world, where the atmosphere is very clear, the moon's light is so strong that "moonstroke" has to be guarded against. Weather changes are most likely to occur when the moon enters a new quarter.

A totally unexpected instance of the moon's influence has been discovered recently. It has been found that long-distance wireless transmissions on certain wave lengths are greatly affected by the state of the moon. This is due to changes in the electrical state of the atmosphere produced by moonlight.

The moon is a cold dead world which appears to absorb all the heat that reaches it from the sun, but to reflect a very large part of the light. Moonlight is particularly rich in ultra-violet rays, and we know that these have a definite influence upon human, animal and plant health. For ths reason alone it is quite possible that the influence of the full moon upon us may be greater than is generally believed. Throughout the ages it has been believed that insane people are most violent at times of full moon; the word "lunatic" itself comes from the Latin luna, meaning the moon. Nor can we deny that, in the moonlight as well as in the springtime, a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.

Quite possibly, too, the pull of the moon, which causes tides not only in the seas, but also in the solid earth, has its effect upon us. These would naturally be most marked at the full and new moon, when the pull is strongest.

Book Thief Sees the Light

Employees of the Muskogee public library came to work recently to find 69 volumes, stolen in 1929 and 1930, piled at the outside return box. A letter accompanying the books said the author had "forsaken the ways of sin," and asked forgiveness.

"I am sorry that these are all the books I have left; I burned the other three boxes before I received the light," the note said.—Kansas City Star.

Historic Holy Ground of Jefferson Barracks

When a commanding site on the high bluffs overlooking the Mississippi river was chosen for the military post of Jefferson Barracks, at St. Louis, in 1826, at the same time was acquired the adjoining bluff, which has become one of the most beautiful national cemeteries in the entire United States. It is a setting with its panoramic view of the majestic river below, and the gently rolling hills covered with lofty forest trees in the background that is surpassed by none of the military cemeteries in which lie the honored dead of the nation.

It is an artistic spot and hallowed by the graves of 14,000 soldiers who have had some part in every war or Indian skirmish ever engaged in by American forces. The records of their lives tell the military history of the United States. It has been a national cemetery, however, only since 1863, when it was so created as a burial place for veterans of the Civil war. During those discordant years, 9,32[illegible] soldiers were buried there, of which [illegible] were Confederate prisoners of war.

The cemetery was started as the burial ground for the army post of Jefferson Barracks, and in that capacity was used not only for soldiers stationed there, but for the members of their families also. It happens thus that the first grave to be placed on the bluff was that of a young girl, Eliza Ann Leah, who was buried there in 1827.

STAGE COACH TALES

By E. C. TAYLOR

The Gun Girl

THE Gun Girl, a little more daring, perhaps, but not so quick on the trigger as the gun girls of the large cities today, made her appearance along the National pike as early as 1834. She was accompanied by four men, and it was only the courageous conduct of Samuel Luman, stage coach driver, that this highway girl and her highwaymen aides were repulsed.

Samuel Luman was one of the best known and best equipped drivers on the old National road. He was a giant in stature, and reputed to be fearless. He began driving a stage coach in 1832.

On August 12, 1834, his coach was waylaid in the mountains between Piney Grove and Frostburg, Md. It was night, and Luman's teams almost ran into a rude obstruction of logs, stumps and brush that had been placed across the road.

The spot was lonely, and surrounded by a thick growth of pine trees. Luman was unarmed, and the only gun among the passengers in the stage coach was an old brass pistol, which, however, was not brought into play.

As the stage coach reached the barrier across the road, one highwayman stepped forward, seized the bridle and ordered Luman to descend from his seat and surrender the mail and money the coach carried. Luman refused.

"What do you want?" he temporized.

"We are traders," the highwayman answered.

"I have nothing to trade," said Luman. "I am satisfied with my trappings and not desirous of exchanging them."

The highwayman holding the lead team thereupon called out to one of his companions hidden in the trees by the roadside to shoot Luman.

The robber leveled his pistol at the stage coach driver and pulled the trigger. There was a snap, and Luman owed his life to the fact that the night air was damp and the powder would not explode.

While the highwayman holding the horses was turning the lead team around so that it faced the opposite direction from the stage coach, the girl called out from the darkness of the roadside, and ordered another highwayman to bind the driver.

One of the robbers mounted part way to the driver's seat, and wrapped the reins tightly around Luman's arm. Luman saw an advantage, and started violently lashing the highwayman with the ends of the reins. The beaten robber backed off, and as he did so, the horses still attached to the stage coach leaped forward, broke from the lead team, and leaped over the barricade on the road. The coach came within an ace of capsizing, but Luman's skill with the reins kept it on its wheels, and the coach and its passengers flew into Frostburg.

Luman told the authorities that the bandits he saw were all heavily disguised. He did not get a look at the gun girl or two of the highwaymen with her who had remained in the dark shadows of the pine trees. The robber who held the bridles of the lead team, he said, wore a long dress like a Mother Hubbard, and the one who bound the reins around his arm wore a white vest, dark pantaloons and a black mask. They were never captured.

When the attack was first made on the stage coach, Luman told the passengers of the impending danger and asked their assistance, but they crouched in their seats and made no effort to help him or defend themselves.

They were all western merchants traveling east to buy goods, and between them they carried $60,000 in cash.

When they reached the Highland house in Frostburg, of which George Evans was proprietor, the grateful passengers took up a collection with which to reward the brave stage coach driver. It was so ludicrously small, though, Luman said later, that he indignantly refused it.

"They were a mean set," was his comment.

Luman gave up driving stage coaches in 1839, and for several years after that interested himself in detective work and punishing robbers of the mail coaches that rattled along the National road.

His life was threatened so frequently, however, that finally Lucius W. Stockton, president of the National Road Stage company, feared for Luman's safety. Luman then moved east of Cumberland, where he continued his activities, and until recently lived in Uniontown, Pa.

Good Advice

President Lawrence Lowell of Harvard, who recently declared that there is too much of the barbaric Roman and too little of the simple Greek spirit in modern sport, was being praised by a group of writers at the Algonquin.

"In my undergraduate days," a successful playwright said, "I wrote a great deal of poetry. Tons of it got in the varsity magazines, and some of it even got in the Century and Harper's.

"When President Lowell bade me farewell on my graduation his last words to me were:

"'Good-by, then, and remember this—your best friend is the waste basket.'

HARD TO ESCAPE FROM ONE'S NICHE

Who Is Not in Clutches of Environment?

Certain environments suggest escape; we are not always satisfied with the niche provided for us; but, like the statues usually connected with the word, we are unable to move ourselves. It is obvious that there are several ways to deal with a formidable obstacle. We may endure it with stoical resignation, we may rise above it and ignore its presence, or we may run away from it altogether.

The amount of courage it takes to overcome the disharmony of circumstances varies in degree, according to one's temperament. Like Hamlet, we know not whether it is nobler to suffer or to oppose. To escape the leisure and ennui of too much wealth, the poor little rich girl dons overalls and runs away to sleep in barns, eat apples and make the acquaintance of rats. The rich little poor girl mounts her hobby and rides away to the land of imagination, hoping some day to find herself famous in Hollywood or other ambitious circles.

The environment of Elizabeth Barrett was such that in order to marry Robert Browning she was obliged to invent means by which she could escape her father's austerity and the tyranny of his home. Her need of something outside the narrowness of her father's selfishness must have strengthened the move for freedom already begun by Jane Austen at her little desk in the corner of the family sitting room trying to hide the products of her brain work from inquisitive eyes, and by Charlotte Bronte and her sisters pacing back and forth round the dining table telling their stories in the effort to see beyond the dreariness of the moors.

In her story called "Father," Elizabeth, of German garden fame, tells of the troubles of Jennifer, who having faithfully kept her promise to her dying mother that she would take good care of her father, feels that the time for freedom has come when her father suddenly confronts her with a new wife. Not yet. He expects her to go cheerfully on being his amanuensis, cook and housekeeper. Jennifer's lover also has a handicap in the form of Sister Alice who has dominated him since he was five and never allowed a single thought of his own to find expression. The author casually remarks that everybody has his Alice. True, is it not?

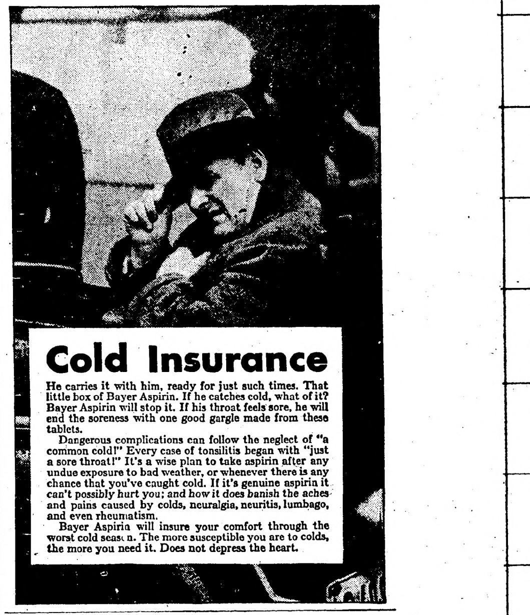
Having enjoyed that story, I happened upon Old Pybus, which everybody read long ago. The author of "Sorrell and Son" proposes the same conflict between environment and contentment, in a different way. The two sons of Old Pybus having disappointed him in their refusal to adopt his ideals of living, the Venerable, as he is called, severs connection with them, though he hangs their pictures on his wall and point them out as having been killed in the war. He finds a place for himself as "boots" in a public inn, but the venerable head never lost its gentleness, "like the gentleness of some stout old tree sunning itself in the light of a tranquil evening." Mary, in the same book, is called upon to sacrifice every interest in life to the whims of an ungrateful brother who has accepted his blindness in so surly a fashion that it has made him spiritually blind to his sister's self-effacement.

But some must watch, while some must sleep:
Thus runs the world away.

World's Tiniest Baby

Pretoria has what is believed to be the tiniest baby in the world. She was so small at birth that they did not weigh her in case the act of weighing might injure her. At fourteen days she weighed three pounds. She is kept wrapped up in cotton-wool and gets her nourishment through the absorption of olive oil, applied to the skin.

Too many theologies have to explain too much; while good deeds have to explain nothing.



Cold Insurance

He carries it with him, ready for just such times. That little box of Bayer Aspirin. If he catches cold, what of it? Bayer Aspirin will stop it. If his throat feels sore, he will end the soreness with one good gargle made from these tablets.

Dangerous complications can follow the neglect of "a common cold!" Every case of tonsilitis began with "just a sore throat!" It's a wise plan to take aspirin after any undue exposure to bad weather, or whenever there is any chance that you've caught cold. If it's genuine aspirin it can't possibly hurt you; and how it does banish the aches and pains caused by colds, neuralgia, neuritis, lumbago, and even rheumatism.

Bayer Aspirin will insure your comfort through the worst cold season. The more susceptible you are to colds, the more you need it. Does not depress the heart.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of $1157.20, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by John W. Eells and Edith Eells, his wife, Mortgagors, to Christopher Graham, Mortgagee, bearing date the 22nd day of April, 1926, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall, and State of Minnesota, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., in Book 111 of Mortgages, on page 254, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage or any part thereof.

NOW, THEREFORE, NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The Southwest Quarter (SW¼) of Section Eight (8), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty (40) West, of the Fifth Principal Meridian, containing 160 acres, according to the United States Government Survey thereof, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Marshall County at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren, in said County and State, on the 12th day of December, 1931, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of $1157.20, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and $50.00 Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated October 22nd, 1931.

Christmas Seal Sales

Everything is in readiness for the official opening of the countywide sale of double-barred cross Christmas Seals which will start simultaneously with the state and nation on Thanksgiving Day. N.M. Engen of Warren is county campaign director. Supt. Nybakken is manager for Holt; and there is a local manager for each community in the county.

Holiday festivity of "the good old days" has been chosen for the design of the Christmas Seal commemorating the Silver Anniversary of the fight against tuberculosis. Pictured on the 1931 seal is an old-time stage coach drawn by four horses prancing in the snow. Aloft on the upper deck a passenger blows his horn to blazon Christmas greetings to the countryside.

Supplies for the local Christmas Seal sale have been received by Supt. Nybakken, who will have charge of distribution here. Included in the package were thousands of Christmas Seals, Christmas Seal bonds, brilliant posters and window cards bearing the health coach as it passes merrily along its way to carry Christmas greetings to all.

The Weather

Since we gave you the last weather report we have had quite a few changes. A heavy drizzly rain started in Friday morning and soaked up everything, continuing until early Saturday morning when it changed to a wet snow and the weather turned colder.

The weather remained cold and blustery until late Monday night when it commenced to snow like in the olden times, and on Tuesday morning the community woke up all covered with a genuine full-fledged winter at the front door coupled with a real blizzard wind all day that piled snow several feet deep in drifts on roads and streets.

Wednesday was clear and cold with forecast for more snow yesterday.

What Quality Cream Means

The following was taken from "Hoard's Dairyman" of October 25, 1931, and gives a mighty good idea of the value of cleanliness and proper feeding and handling methods in the production of Land O'Lakes foods.

"To Land O'Lakes Sweet Cream Butter (produced by Land O'Lakes Crys., Inc.) goes the honor of being the first butter to bear the 'accepted' seal of the Committee on Foods of the American Medical Association."

Such a distinction is one the Farmers of Minnesota can feel justly proud of, knowing that they have produced a food accepted as the highest standard of fine quality foods.

BANKERS FAVOR GRADUAL CHANGE

National Commission Believes Local Sentiment Should Govern Evolution in Methods of Conducting Banking.

If substantial changes are to be brought about in branch banking in the United States they should originate within the states rather than from Washington on interstate lines as proposed in "trade area" branch banking plans, a recent report of the Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association declares. Such changes, it adds, "should develop by evolutionary rather than revolutionary stages."

"The extension of branch banking through state action would mean that states not now permitting state banks to have branches or else closely restricting them, would individually liberalize their laws as an expression of changing local desires and conditions, and this doubtless would insure a deliberate, evolutionary process," the report says. "The other method, that is, through Federal action, would mean a sweeping change for the country as a whole, for legislation granting branch banking powers to national banks in all states, regardless of local sentiment, would, of course, induce equivalent branch banking enactments in every state in the Union not now permitting or really wanting state banks to have branches, in order to keep them on a competitive equality.

Upholds State Privileges

"We find some bankers who feel that a proper stimulus to the development of branch banking would be given by the Federal Government taking the initiative through granting broader privileges within state lines to national banks than they now enjoy. It is argued that state governments could then follow suit as to state banks and that in this way a more progressive branch banking attitude might be promoted by the national banks taking the lead. While we do not deny that there may be some merit in this view as to some specific localities, we stand firm nevertheless on the principle that no such grant of powers to national banks should cross state lines, or exceed the privileges that state legislatures could and would grant to their state banks.

"Moreover we believe that if the choice between these two possible courses of extending branch banking were put up to bankers they would be generally opposed to any forcible imposition of branch banking on the states through the medium of the national bank system. We believe it would be preferable for any change to come about through the more gradual and democratic method of the states granting their banks branch banking powers state by state where, if, and as local conditions and sentiment might be ready for a change."

Nazareth Luth. Church Directory

The following officers were elected at the annual meeting of the congregation of the Nazareth Lutheran church held on Wednesday evening, Nov. 18 at the local church.

The Church Council: Rev. L. M. Redal, President; O. E. Sovde, Vice-President; G. Sanoden, Secretary; H. O. Hanson, Treasurer; F. K. Fredrickson, Trustee for one year, Guy Anderson, Trustee for three years; Hans Fosholm and Alfred Anderson Deacons for one year.

O. H. Nohre holds over for two more years and is the third trustee on the church board.

H. O. Hanson had one more year to serve as trustee but, C. H. Gunhiem who has been the treasurer for many years, wished to retire so he took over his duties and Mr. Fredridson took Mr. Hanson's place on the board.

Guy Anderson took the place of Oscar Furr who retired. Mr. Sovde took the place of Mr. Backlund and Mr. Fosholm was elected as a new member but he too has served on the board for many years in the past.

No bids were recieved for the janitor job and as it was necessary to have a caretaker at once, G. Sanoden who has done the work the past few years, was rehired to take charge of the premises and to do the firing up for Sunday school and all the services at 40c per each time.

The church council also wishes to announce that all those who serve for Luther League and Ladies Aid kindly fire up for these occasions thereby cutting down the expenses.

Four new families were voted upon to join the church and accepted by the congregation. They are: Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Larson and family; Mr. and Mrs. Olaf M. Halvorson and family; Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Larson and family; Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Skjerping and family.

The following members of the Ladies Aid were elected at their annual meeting to serve as the officers for the coming year.

Mrs. G. Sanoden, President.
Mrs. A. B. Anderson, Vice-Pres.
Mrs. Olaf Halvorson, Secretary.
Mrs. H. O. Hanson, Treasurer.

R. Nyhus Makes Deal

WHAT many people call indigestion very often means excess acid in the stomach. The stomach nerves have been over-stimulated, and food sours. The corrective is an alkali, which neutralizes the acids instantly. And the best alkali known to medical science is Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

One spoonful of this harmless, tasteless alkali in water neutralizes instantly many times that much acid, and the symptoms disappear at once. You will never use crude methods when once you learn the efficiency of this. Go, get a small bottle to try.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia prescribed by physicians for 50 years in correcting excess acids. 25c and 50c a bottle—any drug store.

Bolshevik Morals

Sinclair Lewis laid down a book in defense of Bolshevik morals.

"Bolshevik morals may be all right," he said, "but they seem topsy-turvey to me. They remind me of a story.

"A married man down in Palm Beach tried to kiss a pretty girl. He'd often kissed her before, but this time she pushed him away.

"'How dare you try to kiss me, you unfaithful brute!' she snarled. 'Only this afternoon I saw you kissing your own wife. And I heard you tell her besides that she was all the world to you.'

"'Yes,' said the man, 'what of it? There are two worlds, darling. Wife is the old world, and you are the new.'"

When your child tosses and cries out in his sleep, it means he is not comfortable. Very often the trouble is that poisonous waste matter is not being carried off as it should be. Bowels need help—mild, gentle help—but effective. Just the kind Castoria gives. Castoria is a pure vegetable preparation made specially for children's ailments. It contains no harsh, harmful drugs, no narcotics. Don't let your child's rest—and your own—be interrupted. A prompt dose of Castoria will urge stubborn little bowels to act. Then relaxed comfort and restful sleep! Genuine Castoria always has the name:

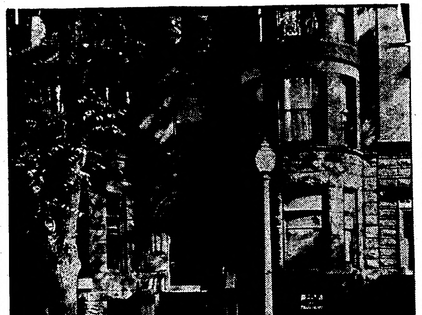
New Headquarters for War Mothers



National headquarters of the American War Mothers have been established in Washington in this large residence building on New Hampshire avenue. A portion of the building will be used for office and administrative purposes, while the remainder will be fitted for residence purposes to be used by dependent war mothers and mothers visiting their sons in government hospitals here.

AMATEURS LINK UP FAR EAST BY RADIO

Keep in Touch With Expedition 7,500 Miles Away.

Washington.—Communications history between organization headquarters and expeditions in the field is being written at this time in Washington, where the National Geographic society is in almost daily touch with its staff representative, Maynard Owen Williams, who is with the Citroen-Haardt Trans-Asia expedition among the Himalaya mountains of northern India 7,500 miles away.

The reception of the frequent messages that fly from this remote region to Washington is dependent on the co-operation of the most elaborate network of amateur radio operators that ever has been organized as an aid to scientific exploration.

Each evening at 6 p. m. eastern standard time more than 150 of America's most expert amateur radio operators, under the supervision of the American Radio Relay league, listen in for messages from the expedition, which are relayed from a station in Beirut, Syria, at the eastern end of the Mediterraneans sea, more than 5,000 miles from Washington.

In most cases the messages are copied direct in Washington and are telephoned a few moments later to the headquarters of the National Geographic society. On some occasions, however, atmospheric conditions have been so bad in the Washington area that it has been impossible to receive the messages. At these times some of the many other listeners with more favorable conditions in their regions have copied the messages, and they have been quickly relayed to their destination.

During the period of more than three months since the expedition began its trek across Asia no messages have failed to reach Washington within a few hours after they were sent.

The value of keeping in almost daily contact with a field party which is often far from ordinary channels of communication has been demonstrated on several occasions. The most recent of these was when a telegraphic report from Srinagar, a capital of Kashmir, stated that the expedition had found it impossible to negotiate the 14,000-foot Burzil pass in the Himalayas with its motor cars and that they had been abandoned. Fears at the society's headquarters were set at rest a few hours later when a radio message from the mountain-climbing party itself, 100 miles north of Srinagar, announced that the cars had climbed over Burzil pass without serious difficulty and were proceeding steadily on their way toward the India-Chinese-Turkestan border.

This is not the first experience of the National Geographic society in communicating between headquarters and field parties by means of radio. With the co-operation of the American Radio Relay league the society pioneered in such activities in 1925, when numerous reports were received through amateurs from the MacMillan-National Geographic-navy expedition to northwestern Greenland, the expedition with which Rear Admiral Byrd obtained his first Arctic flying experience. The technique of radio communication has been greatly improved since 1925, however, and the present communications network is believed to be more efficient than any similar organization which has been in operation.

Man and Wildcat Scare Each Other

Albany, Ore. — Truck-driver Louis Swander went fishing. A wildcat came out of the brush, stared at him. Swander remembered the copy-book advice and looked the animal in the eyes. Then Swander turned and ran. Looking back, he saw the wildcat running in the opposite direction.

Flyers Will Test Two-Seated Pursuit Planes

Mount Clemens, Mich.—Two-seated pursuit planes will be tried out for the first time by the army at Selfridge field this winter, according to Maj. Gerard E. Brower, flight commander of the first pursuit group.

Major Brower said 24 of the new type planes were being sent here to undergo tests to determine how they can be used to the greatest advantage. Delivery of 45 new single seaters also is to start soon, Brower said.

The depression has cut into the activities of flying officers, Major Brower revealed. Whereas an officer usually flies 400 hours a year, he now is flying at the rate of about 220 hours yearly, he said.

Population of Detroit Is Placed at 2,104,764

Detroit.—After a year's study and discussion, the bureau of census finally has determined over the area of the metropolitan district of Detroit and the population.

The bureau has placed the area at 746.52 square miles and the population at 2,104,764. Of the population, 1,568,662 is inside the Detroit city limits and 536,102 in the remainder of the area.

Survey Shows Seasonal Jobs of U. S. Workers

Philadelphia.—Of the total of 5,690,666 wage earners in 126 manufacturing industries in the United States, at least 797,790 are regularly thrown out of employment because of seasonal variations in productive activities, according to a survey by Dr. J. Parker Bursk, assistant professor of economics and social statistics at the University of Pennsylvania.

The study is one of a series made under the auspices of the industrial research department of the university's Wharton school of finance and commerce, and is based on reports sent to the bureau of census by industries over a period of 21 years.

According to the department of industrial research, it is the first comprehensive quantitative study of seasonal variations in industrial employment and is particularly important because in any program for the regulation of employment, seasonal variations, due to their complex character, offer a logical point of attack.

One Child's Infirmity Brings Aid to Others

Detroit.—A gray-haired, feeble old gentleman from Ohio wandered through the Children's hospital of Michigan the other day, his eyes lighting up with pleasure as he noted the modern devices for aiding and treating the maimed children.

It was Quincy Stubbs, of Cincinnati, eighty-four years old. He looked with justifiable pride on the modern buildings and scientific care, for in the United States he probably has spent more time fighting for crippled children than any other person.

Stubbs' uphill fight for deformed children began in 1896, when he was a poor laboring man, without sufficient funds to purchase a $40 brace for his daughter, Clara, suffering with curvature of the spine.

"When I could not buy the brace, I canvassed hospitals for aid," Stubbs said, "but there was none coming. There were no provisions for poor children. I guess the rich were taken care of, but the poor had to shift for themselves."

It was then Stubbs began a campaign for children's aid in Ohio. It was nineteen years before his fight bore fruit. Today many states have hospitals for crippled children.

WAIFS GRANTED OFFICIAL CERTIFICATES OF BIRTH

Bar Sinister Removed by New Illinois Law.

Chicago.—Approximately 300 waifs of unknown parentage, adopted recently in Chicago, have been granted official birth certificates under a law passed by the last session of the legislature. Hundreds of similar certificates have been and are being issued throughout the state, thus removing the bar sinister from innocent infants.

Regarded as one of the most humane and righteous measures ever enacted, the bill was drafted by William E. Golden, deputy clerk of the Cook County court at Chicago. Representative Edward Skarda of Chicago, introduced the bill which was passed unanimously by both houses of the legislature at Springfield and promptly signed by Governor Emmerson.

Attorney General Carlstrom has formally pronounced the law valid and mandatory, and also retroactive, so that thousands of individuals may now be availed of the opportunity to erase the "scarlet letter."

Here is the "meat" of the bill, effective as law July 1, 1931:

"Whenever a decree of adoption has been entered declaring a child adopted in any court of competent jurisdiction in the State of Illinois, a certificate of the decree of adoption may be recorded with the proper department of registration of births, and a certificate of birth shall issue upon request, bearing the new name of the child as shown in the decree of adoption, the names of the foster parents of the said child, age, sex, date of birth, but no reference in any birth certificate shall have reference to the adoption of the said child."

Prior to the passage of this law almost endless trouble had been caused in and out of courts, and bitter shame and distress to those unfortunates who have been unable to obtain a formal birth certificate.

Open Up Radio System, Germany to Venezuela

Berlin.—Germany's sixth overseas telephonic connection—this time with Venezuela—has just been opened. Connections have been possible with Siam, Java and Rio Janeiro since last year. Buenos Aires, which was first reached three years ago, now has connection over a second line.

"The Venezuela line operated through the Nauen and Beelitz stations here, and through a newly opened station at Maracay, near Caracas. The fee is $10 a minute.

POISON in Your bowels!

Poisons absorbed into the system from souring waste in the bowels, cause that dull, headachy, sluggish, bilious condition; coat the tongue; foul the breath; sap energy, strength and nerve-force. A little of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will clear up trouble like that, gently, harmlessly, in a hurry. The difference it will make in your feelings over night will prove its merit to you.

Dr. Caldwell studied constipation for over forty-seven years. This long experience enabled him to make his prescription just what men, women, old people and children need to make their bowels help themselves. Its natural, mild, thorough action and its pleasant taste commend it to everyone. That's why "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is the most popular laxative drugstores sell.

Modern Girl Has Small Knowledge of Thimbles

Charley Chaplin, the world's funniest film star, is not credited with many amusing stories. His forte is pantomime. It is related, however, that he recently addressed a girls' industrial school on the fringe of the London slums and regaled them with bits of Hollywood life.

But Charley laid stress on the domestic ignorance of the average modern American girl, exclaiming: "Why, most of them don't know one end of a needle from another.

"I know a charming young lady who, on graduating from a celebrated 'finishing school' speedily got engaged and as the wedding day approached, was showered with gifts. Among them was a nest of gold thimbles. When she looked at the tiny glistening things she exclaimed in dismay:

THE STORY

At nightfall, in the old city of New Orleans, in the year 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him. Afterward he learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde flees from gens d'armes, taking refuge in a garden, where he overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered, recovering consciousness to find himself a prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, Spanish ship bearing contraband arms and ammunition for the Venezuelans under Bolivar. On board are the conspirators he had overheard, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. An attempt to seize the ship fails. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He does not tell her of his love, but feels she is not indifferent to him. The vessel is wrecked during another attempt to seize it, and Garde, thrown overboard, reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone.

CHAPTER III

Tucayan

The morning sun dried my clothes and filled me with comfortable warmth. Except for inconsiderable soreness from the buffeting of the storm and a tender spot on my head that kept Adolfo in my mind, I was none the worse for the extraordinary experience in which I had reached the shore of Venezuela. That I had an implacable enemy in the person of Adolfo de Fuentes was somewhat disquieting, for Spain ruled Venezuela, and if De Fuentes survived the wreck my stay in the country would be to me a constant source of danger. Yet to leave Venezuela would be to turn my face from the lodestar of love that had directed my actions since that night of moon-madness in the Place d'Armes. If the Senorita Dulce lived she was even now in Venezuela, and where the Senorita was there I would be also.

I turned my face to the southward and moved through the solemn silence of primeval forests. I left the jungle floor at last and climbed the timbered slopes to the crest of a mountain range that paralleled the coast. Extending far to the south, I saw the checkered green and brown of cultivated fields, and the irregular outlines of a few tiny villages, and even farther southward yet the forested slopes began again, to disappear in the misty distance.

Musing, I looked upon this land of beauty, where peace should have reigned supreme, but did not, because Bolivar and his revolutionary army contended for its possession against La Torre, the right hand of Ferdinand VII, august king of Spain. Even as I stood, lost in admiration of the lovely scene, the clank of arms came to me, and the clattering of shod hoofs upon a rocky road. A body of soldiers mounted on mules passed in single file along a narrow way that the underbrush had hidden from my view. I watched them from the concealment of a great ceiba tree.

"A sweet reception," said a voice, in Spanish, "to our colonel. I wonder if he lost his lady-love."

"A thing of no importance," said another; "there are many more—and De Fuentes never lacks a lady-love."

Then Adolfo had been saved . . . but the Senorita Dulce! Ah—had the storm, after all, claimed that lovely lady? My mad worship would not let me believe it. Surely the Master of our souls would not have brought me through and taken her. Well, I would know, for they were evidently going to Adolfo now; they were traveling west and the colonel's destination had been Caracas. Caracas, therefore, was east.

After the sounds of their passing had died away I descended the rocky declivity to the road and bent my steps to the east. I heard, after three hours of rapid walking, the mingled noises of a town, so, leaving the road, I beat back into the forest and passed north of the settlement, which, I was to learn, was Maracay, a city on the lake.

Just before the sun went down I came to a village unexpectedly, because it did not offer the mixed noises that Indian villages always have. The village lay under the somber silence of a tomb. I was in it before I realized that any settlement was near.

The first few jacals I passed were in ruins, and neither dogs nor children came out to greet me. I began to wonder if the storm had reached this far. Now I came across a prone figure in the path, a flattened figure with face pressed against the earth as though he were endeavoring to look through it. I had seen dead men before; I had seen scores of them upon the battlefield. Now other figures—a woman and a child—lay before me; and now five men upon a single gibbet, and a boy of ten or less hanging by a vine around his neck, his slim bare feet pointing pathetically toward the earth. Every house was down—burned or crushed as though a giant hand had pressed upon them, and every occupant was dead.

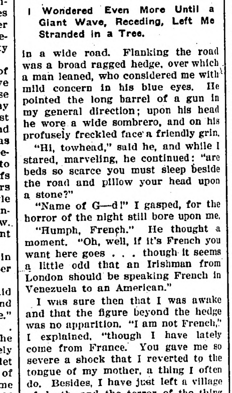
I went through the awful length of that silent village—which must have had three hundred souls—with a dreadful desolation of death around me, and dropped to my knees at the end of the street of terrors and raised my face to the graying sky. A figure rose up beside me, rose up slowly, the horribly emaciated figure of an aged man whose unseeing eyes were fixed upon space and whose thin lips were forming faint words. "My wife," he whispered, "and the two boys—and a girl—" He was silent a moment. "Gone, all gone!"

"Who did it?" I inquired. "In the name of God, Senor, who could have done this thing?"

"Morales," he gasped. He drew in a long breath for one last effort, raised a right hand in half a salute, and whispered: "Viva Bolivar!"

Now, like a man possessed, I got to my feet and ran through the wood; ran madly, wildly, stumblingly, frenziedly, wringing my hands and calling down the curses of God upon a people who would do so atrocious a thing. Through the long night I went, raving; until I fell at last exhausted, and awoke with the blessed sun upon my face.

With much labor, for my body seemed to be the habitation of a hundred aches, I got to my feet and stood in a wide road. Flanking the road was a broad ragged hedge, over which a man leaned, who considered me with mild concern in his blue eyes. He pointed the long barrel of a gun in my general direction; upon his head he wore a wide sombrero, and on his profusely freckled face a friendly grin.



I Wondered Even More Until a Giant Wave, Receding, Left Me Stranded in a Tree.

"Hi, towhead," said he, and while I stared, marveling, he continued: "are beds so scarce you must sleep beside the road and pillow your head upon a stone?"

"Name of G—d!" I gasped, for the horror of the night still bore upon me.

"Humph, French." He thought a moment. "Oh, well, if it's French you want here goes . . . though it seems a little odd that an Irishman from London should be speaking French in Venezuela to an American."

I was sure then that I was awake and that the figure beyond the hedge was no apparition. "I am not French," I explained, "though I have lately come from France. You gave me so severe a shock that I reverted to the tongue of my mother, a thing I often do. Besides, I have just left a village of death, and the terror of the thing is still with me."

"Tucayan," he said; "Morales passed that way two days ago. Such is the Spaniard's method; no man in his path is left alive."

"The last man in Tucayan died in my arms," I said, "and with his last breath he whispered, 'Viva Bolivar!'"

"Simon Bolivar has so great a hold upon his people . . . he will win, some day." His blue eyes went over me appraisingly. I think I read approval there. "Tall," he mused, "with shoulders, and a light in the eye; knows the woods and the sea, I take it, and may have had a turn at soldiering. May I ask you who you are?"

"Assuredly; I am Loren Garde. My father is Norse, a planter of the lower Mississippi valley, and my mother in her youth was the belle of Vieux Carre."

He leaned the gun against his shoulder. "Norse and French . . . such a combination ought to make you fight—and love—like the devil!"

"I fear I have had my share of fighting," I admitted, "but as for love—" I sighed because I visualized the glorious Lamartina.

"If you have come to Venezuela to fight, the ranks of Simon Bolivar are open to you, and I can promise you—"

"Francisco Perez intimated much the same thing."

There was studied calculation in his survey of me. "You know Francisco Perez?"

"I have come from New Orleans with him on the Santa Lucrecia."

He twisted a finger in his ear. "Balmy," he said, "a touch of the sun." He looked at me with professional sympathy. "Did you say the Santa Lucrecia?"

"Exactly; would I not know the name of the ship that brought me from New Orleans?"

"Oh, sure." He laughed. "Only, the Santa Lucrecia has not been sighted. When it is I shall hear a whistle from the east, and when I hear it I shall face west and whistle, and another man a kilometer from here will send the signal along. On the Puerto Cabello road other sentinels will signal to one another, and on the Valencia road, and the road to Barcelona, and roads to Calabozo and Ocumare. A man stationed upon the heights will sight it as it enters the harbor of La Guaira, which is the port of Caracas, and in five minutes every follower of Bolivar within fifty miles shall know it, and soldiers will spring up like spirits out of the earth, for the Santa Lucrecia brings a cargo of arms and knives and ammunition sufficient for an army. And then we will take—"

"If the men of Bolivar can whistle the Santa Lucrecia into the harbor of La Guaira, my freckled patriot, or into any other port except that dreadful port of missing men, they may take the prize as the champion whistlers of the ages, for, only two nights and a day ago the deck of that unfortunate ship was the scene of mutiny, and a tropical storm came up and washed the palm of victory upon a reef. As I fell into the water I saw them working with the lifeboats. A friendly spar, and the wind and waves, carried me on to the land."

He stood, long in thought. "Then Francisco and the cargo—"

He stopped, alert, for the road gave out the sounds of approaching horsemen. I pushed my way quickly through the hedge and crouched beside him as the cavalcade came into view.

Adolfo led the van. He rode in silence, his heavy features exhibiting lines of grimness. The Senorita rode beside him. A mule's length behind them rode Polito, a voluminous bandage around his head, eyes upraised to fleecy, westward-winging clouds, and upon his lips a softly whistled tune. There was something about the boy that made one love him. Two other women, and two men—doubtless survivors of the wreck—trailed along, and a score of soldiers brought up the rear.

Now my eyes went back to the Senorita, who had come out of the storm and into my arms. I drank deeply of the beauty of her, I exulted in my dreams, and gasped at my recollections. A wild exhilaration seized me, and I came up slowly, to find myself shoulder to shoulder with the "Irishman from London," whose eyes were gleaming, whose breath was hissing through his teeth, and whose gun was rising carefully to bear upon De Fuentes. "No," I whispered, "no!" I grabbed him and, as we contended grimly and in silence for possession of the weapon, the cavalcade passed on. Then I loosed him and waited.

"What a powerful brute you are!" And then, "Dizzard," he gasped, "you poor doodle! That man is De Fuentes, aide of Morales, and a greater butcher by far than the infamous Butcher himself."

"You might have missed him," I said, "and killed the lady."

"Oh, the lady? Humph."

"Yes, the lady. Besides, Adolfo belongs to me."

He found his sombrero and pulled it down over tumbled red hair. "So Adolfo belongs to you . . . My eye!" he cried. "Yet De Fuentes went to Spain to get a bride—and I can say this much for him: He has surely picked the fairest flower in the Spanish garden!"

"It's a long way from Spain to the cathedral," I said.

Live a few moments with each of your friends this Christmas

A CHRISTMAS CARD is next best to a personal visit. As you address the cards it's like living for a moment with your friends. It is your enjoyment—as well as theirs. And whether you select one design for all or get variety from the famous Burgoyne box assortment of twelve, do so early—and enjoyably.

Pointer for Traders

If you manufacture goods bearing the likeness of a turtle as trade-mark, change your trade-mark before trying to sell in China, advises Col. I. M. Cosgrove, Canadian trade commissioner at Shanghai. In China, the turtle is a "bad joss" character and an insult, says Colonel Cosgrove. One firm which shipped goods with that trade-mark to China was "stuck," according to him.

To be in comfortable circumstances is always to have the necessary ten dollar bill.

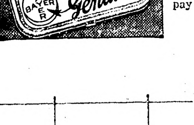
"I'M going, anyway"

THE modern Miss needs no "time out" for the time of month.

If you've ever taken Bayer Aspirin for a headache, you know how soon the pain subsides. It is just as effective in the relief of those pains peculiar to women!

Don't dedicate certain days of every month to suffering. It's old-fashioned. It's unnecessary. Aspirin will always enable you to carry on in comfort. Take enough to assure your complete comfort. If it is genuine aspirin it cannot possibly hurt you. Bayer Aspirin does not depress the heart. It does not upset the stomach. It does nothing but stop the pain.

Headaches come at inconvenient times. So do colds. But a little Bayer Aspirin will always save the day. A throat so sore you can hardly swallow is made comfortable with one good gargle made from these tablets. Neuralgia. Neuritis. Rheumatism. Pains that once kept people home are forgotten half an hour after taking a few of these remarkable tablets. So are the little nagging aches that bring fatigue and "nerves" by day, or a sleepless night.



Genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets cost so very little after all, that it doesn't pay to experiment with imitations!

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of $1157.20, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by John W. Eells and Edith Eells, his wife, Mortgagors, to Chistopher Graham, Mortgagee, bearing date the 22nd day of April, 1926, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., in Book 111 of Mortgages, on page 254, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage or any part thereof.

NOW, THEREFORE, NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The Southwest Quarter (SW¼) of Section Eight (8), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty (40) West, of the Fifth Principal Meridian, containing 160 acres, according to the United States Government Survey thereof, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Marshall County at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren, in said County and State, on the 12th day of December, 1931, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of $1157.20, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and $50.00 Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

BANKERS SUGGEST BANKING REFORMS

Economic Policy Commission of American Bankers Association Recommends Aids to Progress in Banking Business.

FOLLOWING a nation-wide survey of banking conditions and opinion among bankers, the Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association has made the following recommendations for banking betterment:

"Under the category of improved bank management specific improvements we might summarize are:

"(1) Liquidation or consolidation of banks where changed local economic conditions render this desirable;

"(2) Wider affiliation among state banks with the Federal Reserve System;

"(3) Development of limited branch banking where economic conditions and legal authority make this expedient;

"(4) A more general practice, especially lacking among country banks, to analyze the cost of carrying accounts and other operating details and the establishment of proper service charges to make all classes of function profitable;

"(5) A more general application of the theory and practice of secondary reserves;

"(6) Avoidance by banks of undue borrowing merely to increase their own profits by relending at higher rates, or to over-expand credit to local business in order to increase their own business;

"(7) Cooperation among bankers in local communities through city, county or regional clearinghouses so as to promote mutually beneficial conditions and practices;

"(8) The insistence upon higher educational effort and qualifications among employees, especially those to be trusted with executive duties.

Legislative Measures Proposed

"There are some external measures, along moderate legislative and supervisory lines, that we also believe would help strengthen banking. Among these are:

"(1) The broadening in the states of branch banking laws where conditions warrant an extension of this type of banking service to the public;

"(2) The establishment of sound minimum capital funds under which banks will be allowed to operate, which should be materially higher than now prevails in most states; specifically, we believe that the minimum capital with which any new bank shall be chartered, whether state or national, should be at least $50,000;

"(3) The provision of funds and regulations to keep the official staffs of all supervisory departments up to a level of ability and integrity that will universally inspire confidence among bankers whose activities they are empowered to review, and will supply real added defenses to the public interests they are appointed to protect.

"(4) In connection with the policies of bank chartering departments, we would recommend that, even to a greater extent than is now the practice, the greatest care and moderation should be exercised in granting new charters, so as to guard against overbanking or the launching of new banks by unqualified persons, which have doubtless been serious factors in the bank failure situation in the past.

"(5) Also, referring to Federal Reserve practice not requiring legislation, we believe that the Federal Reserve Banks should exercise more freely their rights to examine banks and use their discretionary power to refuse rediscount facilities to banks indulging in objectionable banking methods."

Banker-Farmer Plan

An editorial in Southern Cultivator says: "Favorable comment is being made upon the wisdom and promised results of the farmer-banker agricultural program in Georgia. Industrial leaders and publicists, noting that 115 of the 161 counties in the state have pledged prosecution of the 'live-at-home' farm reform, are regarding the working out of the plan this year as of more interest to American farmers than any developments of the Soviet five-year plan in Russia. Agricultural actuaries are of the opinion that if Georgia farmers, backed by our cooperating bankers and supply men, demonstrate the expected economics and profits of this home-support plan, it will quickly become a contagious custom all over the agricultural areas of the nation. It will be the writing of a new 'declaration of independence' for the individualist farmers of the country, putting them upon solid terms of credit and prosperity without need of recourse to federal or state financial relief measures. The man of the soil who lives year in and year out 'on his own' will stand up in his community as an economic freeman, making his own terms with the world of finance and trade."

A meeting of farmers, bankers, and newspaper men of St. Croix County, Wisconsin, recently organized a drive to promote the growing of alfalfa in such quantity as to save the dairymen the expense of commercial feed, and insure greater dairy profits. It is planned in this campaign to have, within the next three years, at least one acre of alfalfa produced for each dairy cow in the county, or a total of about 40,000 acres.

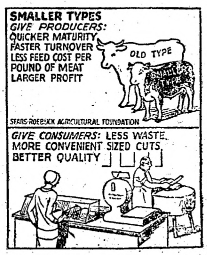
BIGGEST NOT ALWAYS BEST

The saying that "Fine goods come in small packages," applies to many farm products, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation states. From the viewpoint of both producers and consumers, medium sizes often have decided advantages over the large sizes.

Until comparatively recent times, great weight and immense bulk were the primary objects of live stock producers. Instead of the tallowy mountains four to six years old formerly popular in the steer market, the modern preference is for baby beeves of 1,000 pounds or less and around a year old. Behemoth hogs weighing 400 to 500 pounds and twelve to eighteen months old, driven to market on foot in former years, have been displaced by those only half a year old and weighing around 200 pounds. Lambs of 80 to 85 pounds bring a big premium over heavy weights, although it is very easy to grow them much larger.

Producing the lighter weights gives the farmer the advantage of quick maturity, rapid turnover, and less feed per pound of meat. Young animals will make 25 to 50 per cent more gain than older animals from a given amount of feed.

The small carcasses cut up with less waste to the butcher and consumer, and furnish thick light retail cuts which consumers prefer because they are cheaper and of convenient size for family use, the Foundation adds.



SMALLER TYPES
GIVE PRODUCERS:
QUICKER MATURITY
FASTER TURNOVER
LESS FEED COST PER POUND OF MEAT
LARGER PROFIT
OLD TYPE
SMALLER TYPE
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION
GIVE CONSUMERS: LESS WASTE, MORE CONVENIENT SIZED CUTS, BETTER QUALITY

Freezing Weather--- and Your Cream

Be careful of your cream, now that cold weather is with us again. Frozen cream will not produce Land O'Lakes butter, as freezing breaks down the butterfat granules and causes the butter made from it to taste grainy as though it contained cornmeal. Particles of ice may also cause a lower test than the cream would ordinarily have.

Protect your cream from freezing.

Guri Sando Ellestad

Funeral services were conducted here on Friday at the Nazareth Lutheran church for Mrs. Guri Sando Ellestad. She was born October 23, 1855 at Paint Creek, Iowa.

Her mother died when she was two years old, so she was adopted by Mr. and Mrs. Tollef Haagenson of that place.

On March 24, 1875 she was united in marriage to Erick Ellestad who preceeded her in death Jan. 23, 1905.

To this union ten children were born. Six of whom are still living. They are Tollef and Clara Ellestad of Spring Grove, Gerhard Ellestad and Mrs. Amelia Wisness of Sanish, N. Dak., Carl Ellestad and Mrs. O. H. Nohre at Holt.

She lived at Spring Grove, Minn., till in August, 1929 when her health started to fail and she was brought to Holt.

With the exception of Mrs. Wisness and Gerhard the children were all at her bedside when she passed away peacefully at two o'clock on the afternoon of Nov. 25. She suffered much through life but now we feel assured she is with those whom have gone before, where there is no suffering, death nor sorrow, but only joy.

The remains were shipped to Spring Grove on Friday evening and enterment was made in the family plot there on Monday.

Rev. Redal officiated at the services here.

We hereby express our thanks to our friends and neighbors for their kindness and help during the illness and death of our dear mother. We also wish to thank the Holt Male Quartet for the beautiful songs, Rev. Redal for his words of sympathy and comfort and all those who decorated the church and broght flowers.

Harold Nohre Finishes Season

Harold Nohre completed the season as a reserve member of the championship football squad at Concordia College on Monday evening when the players were guests at the annual football banquet. The Cobbers had one of the most successful seasons in the Minnesota State College grid championship. Playing five league games, Concordia defeated four opponents to end the season with a higher percentage than any club in the loop.

A number of ladies gathered at the S. H. Nohre home Sunday afternoon and gave Mrs. Edgar Horien a parcel shower.

Shaver Promoted; Rhen Hired

Mr. and Mrs. L. Shaver and family moved to Leonard, Minn., Saturday. They moved here a year and a half ago when Mr. Shaver took over the job as the assistant buttermaker at the local creamery. Last winter he took an advanced course in the creamery operators division at the Univesity Farm, St. Paul, and passed with the highest marks from a large class.

Mr. Shaver will now be manager of the creamery at Leonard and in asmuch as we regret to see them move away, we wish them success in their new place.

Tony Rhen and family from Leonard, Minnesota moved here this week. They are occupying the Haarstad house vacated by the Shaver family.

Mr. Rhen who has three years experience as a creamery man has taken over the duties as assistant buttermaker at the local creamery. The News joins the people of this community in bidding them welcome here.

We always appreciate your sending in news items.

Air View of "the West Point of the Air"

Known as "the West Point of the Air," the new Randolph field, 16 miles northeast of San Antonio, stretches like a model city before the camera eye in this aerial photograph. The "field" will include 500 buildings surrounded by flying fields for the use of the 500 planes and 3,500 pupils and instructors who can be accommodated.

Bread and Butter Diet for Children

U. S. Nutritionists Prescribe Proper Food.

Washington.—Old-fashioned bread and butter is the backbone of the diet recommended by Uncle Sam's nutritionists with the Department of Agriculture for all growing children, according to an official bulletin just issued.

"Ideas about feeding children have undergone many changes in recent years," the official food experts say. "The former tendency to keep children unduly long on a baby diet has given way to the recent practice of supplementing the milk diet early in life with a variety of wholesome foods simply prepared."

Milk and bread and butter and potatoes are among the foods recommended for each meal; fruit and other vegetables at least twice a day; egg or meat, and small amounts of sweets.

Variety is advised in the preparation and serving of food in different ways and different combinations. Thus bread is recommended either plain with butter or toasted, toasted rolls, bread pudding or in sandwiches.

The sandwich combinations suggested include grated carrots, lettuce, water cress, or peanut butter with chopped celery. Or bread, they suggest, may be served with jelly or jam in limited quantities either as dessert or immediately after the meal.

Breakfast for the young child may usually consist of fruit, cereal, toast with butter and milk, the report suggests. Variety is offered in the fruits served and a strip or two of bacon cooked until crisp and drained of fat may be served occasionally for variety. There is no objection to egg when the child is not having egg for dinner or supper.

A typical dinner permitting of variations is given consisting of broiled meat ball, buttered string beans, baked potato, bread and butter, lettuce, milk and baked apple. The report gives a dozen other dinner menus.

A dozen supper menus are also listed such as, to give the first, baked potato and bacon, fresh tomato and lettuce, bread and butter, milk, muskmelon.

"A healthy child," to quote the government experts, "who has an abundance of the right kinds of food grows normally and is contented and well developed. His legs are straight and strong and his weight is satisfactory for his build, height and age. He has sound teeth and hair that is glossy, smooth and not brittle. His skin is clear and his color is good. He has an alert expression and bright, clear eyes, with no dark circles underneath. He is active and has a good appetite for his meals."

Aged California Woman Tells of Trek in 1853

San Francisco.—Recounting tales of the great trek from Missouri to California in '53, Mrs. Mary E. Harris, who, as a child crossed the plains in a covered wagon, celebrated her eighty-ninth birthday recently.

Surrounded by her four sons at 122 Carl street, Mrs. Harris spoke of her adventures:

"I was eleven when we made the trip," she said. "For over six months home was a lumbering Conestoga wagon.

"Not once during the trip were we bothered with Indians. Those whom we saw seemed friendly. It seems a long, long time ago now, when I think of how people are shot across the continent in express trains.

"Over the Sierra we went, past the famous gold diggings. The tales of the goldfields brought my mother and father West."

Mrs. Harris' family finally settled on a ranch near San Jose. It was there that she met her husband, then sheriff of Santa Clara county.

Her four sons are Marshall, Cyrus, James and Nicholas, all San Francisco business men.

Bees Use Eagle for Home

Christiansburg, Va.—Apparently in search of a unique storage place, a colony of bees has established itself in the large eagle which, mounted atop a large ball, stands on the Christiansburg courthouse. Dozens of bees may be seen every day flitting in and out.

Radio revealed in all its baldness how many people don't like classical music. Another exposure.

Woman Dies as Home Is Fired by Robbers

Phoenix, Ariz.—Mrs. W. L. Wright was burned to death and her husband was rescued from their flaming home in a critical condition after two men had robbed them, beaten them and set fire to the house.

Danish Chemist Claims He Has Ideal Gas Mask

Copenhagen.—A filter for gas masks which excludes 99.8 per cent of all poisons from the breathing tubes has been invented by the Danish chemist N. L. Hansen, and with it he has evolved an elaborate plan for the protection of cities against air raids dealing gas.

Denmark is disarmed. It has no military forces. But experiments with poison gases have been continued by military chemists against the day when Denmark might possibly be the object of such an attack. Heretofore gas masks, the only known protection against this invisible death, have never been really effective in keeping out the poison. Even the very best known filters permit up to 20 per cent of the fumes to be inhaled.

Hansen believes his invention will revolutionize the work of war laboratories the world over. It is expected that the Danish government will place the invention at the disposal of all nations.

Art Relics Recovered

Pisa.—A fine fresco by Spinello Aretino, another representing the annunciation, and two monolithic granite columns were discovered during restoration of an old church in Ripoli.

Girl Is Given Sight and Sees Wonderland

Skill of the Surgeon Banishes Child's Blindness.

Bellaire, Ohio.—The world is a wonderland to Edna Goddard, nine, who stares rapturously at strange objects which she had conjured differently in a life of blindness.

The skill of a surgeon gave Edna sight which had been blotted out at birth by a double cataract.

"Everything seems so funny," she laughed gleefully, looking at her mother. "Even mamma seems strange. She seemed different before."

The generosity of local civic clubs and the skill of Dr. Leo Covert, neighbor of the Goddards, opened up the wonderland for Edna. She had been born blind. As she learned to walk, she also learned the ways of the blind, how she must grope her way about and depend upon her accentuated senses of hearing and touch to safeguard herself from danger. She learned how to read from the raised alphabet. Her parents said she never complained.

The Goddards were poor, unable to take Edna to a specialist. Civic clubs interested themselves in her case. They consulted Doctor Covert, who offered to perform the operation.

When the bandages were removed Edna shrieked in childish joy.

"I can see," she said.

But everything seemed different from what she had conjured in her world of darkness. Color was particularly puzzling.

"I didn't know that eyes were of different colors," she said. "Everything is so bright and different. It's wonderful."

She is learning the names of chairs and other objects about her home. Although she had known them by touch, in sight they were strange.

Woman Discovers She's Been Dead for 5 Years

Genoa, Italy.—After seven years of insanity, Sig. Angela Moresco regained her reason to find out that she has been officially "dead" for five years. The hospital for the insane, after investigation, admitted that an error in names had been made and another woman had died under the name of Moresco. Legal steps are under way to straighten out the tangle.

Interesting Items —of— NORTH DAKOTA

Harvey.—The Wellsburg Gun club sponsored its annual Turkey Shoot last Sunday. Sportsmen who starred in the trap shoot were awarded turkeys as prizes.

Rugby.—Halvor Johnson, Tagus, N. N., was given six months in jail and fined $75, following a drunken driving charge growing out of an accident in which two people were injured.

Dickinson.—The Lehigh Briquetting plant, southwest of here, is now operating at full capacity, having between 75 and 100 men working. All but one are local men.

Glen Ullin.—The local Boy Scout troop is making plans for a carnival to be staged the week after Christmas. Scoutmaster Steig will be in charge and guarantees a good time for all.

Neche.— A young bronze tom, weighing almost 26 pounds, was the top bird in the heavy turkey class of the annual Pembina County Poultry Show which ended here last Saturday, with over 500 exhibits entered.

Hazen.—The Hazen high school received a visit from the state director of secondary instruction and has been elevated from a first class consolidated school to a classified second class school.

Kenmare.—The War Memorial building was the scene of tha 26th annual Thanksgiving ball sponsored by the Kenmare fire department. Proceeds of the event go toward paying for equipment.

Minot.—Ice on the wings of a large cabin monoplane having four occupants, forced the pilot to make a forced landing near Burlington. The ship was en route to Minneapolis from Great Falls, Montana.

Walcott.— Bernard Bakko, cornet player in the local juvenile band, lost the index finger on his right hand, which was injured two weeks ago in a corn-picker. It was necessary to amputate the finger after efforts to save it were unavailing.

Enderlin.—Dedication of the newly completed Moore consolidated school took place here Tuesday with Miss Bertha Palmer giving the principal address. A public inspection followed the dedication program and lunch was served by the Parent-Teachers association.

Williston.—A verdict of guilty was returned by the jury in the case of D. I. Todd, local farmer who was charged with butchering and selling the meat of a cow belonging to Fred Summers, McKenzie county rancher. The jury reached the verdict after 20 hours deliberation.

Grand Forks.—M. E. Mattson, former city auditorium janitor, serving a 12-year-term in connection with the death of Miss Ida Anderson, 19, who died as a result of an illegal operation, is seeking commutation of the sentence when the pardon board meets. Mattson has served six years.

Langdon.—The Cavalier Taxpayers association was organized at a meeting attended by 300 taxpayers of the county. Resolutions were passed asking that certain county officers' salaries be cut 20 per cent, and that road and other construction work be abandoned, wherever possible, in 1932.

Jamestown.—Representatives from all sections of the state organized the Upper Missouri River Department and Conservation association. Henry W. Wilson, New Rockford, was elected as president. The group may operate separately or become a member of the Greater North Dakota association.

Williston.—The newly arrived son of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Canfield, local aviator, received his first airplane ride when but two days old. Mr. Canfield and son, accompanied by three nurses, circled the city, took a look at the Missouri near here, and remained aloft for about fifteen minutes.

Lidgerwood.—Construction of a dam on the Wild Rice river with the object of raising the level of Lake Tewaukan five feet has been launched by sportsmen of Lidgerwood and vicinity. At present the river bed is dry from prolonged drought, thus aiding construction work which is being done by farmers living near the lake.

Drake.—While repairing a .22 caliber rifle, Bennie Kandt, 17, was accidentally shot when a cartridge in the gun went off. Entering the body just above the stomach the bullet forced its way between the stomach and the heart, coming out in back. Barring complications or infection, Bennie will recover.

Brantford.—An automobile driven by George Pinchott, Warwick, ran into a flock of 150 sheep which were being driven here for shipment to St. Paul. Twenty-nine were killed outright and six others injured so badly they had to be killed later. The accident happened at night and the driver of the car did not see the sheep.

Cando.—The Lichty-Maust chapter of the Future Farmers of America held its second annual Father and Sons banquet with approximately 90 guests in attendance.

Fargo.—The dairy department of the Agricultural college here has recently installed a new removable coil pasteurizer and a stainless steel cheese vat, the latter being about three feet wide and eight feet long. The new process of pasteurization consists of lowering a coil containing hot or cold water into a can of milk and allowing it to remain until pasteurization is complete.

SWEET NOTES CAME FROM ENGINE BELL

Noise to One Person May Be Music to Another.

More than once the Woman has had to spend the night at a hotel near a railroad station, and she has never considered it a pleasure. In fact, every time she spent the night near a railroad station it meant a wakeful night, for the passing trains with their clanging bells kept her awake.

But, as has been stated before, what is noise to one person is music to another.

On a recent visit to the Poconos it was the Woman's pleasure to meet a prominent citizen from Philadelphia who has built a show place up in the Blue Ridge hills. And one of the things he pointed out to her with the most pride, after they had traversed flower and vegetable garden and gone through his quaint and beautiful home, was a bell that he explained had once belonged to a locomotive.

"A friend of mine and I," explained the well-to-do householder, "once had to put up for the night at a tiny, dirty hotel. It was a dreadful place, but we were too tired to go any further. And all night long as we lay there we heard the bells on the trains. And they were so sweet that I made up my mind I would try to own one. I wrote to the company, but they replied by saying all their bells were on engines and they couldn't take them off. Long after that they wrote to me saying two engines had been sold to a junk dealer and perhaps if I still wanted the bell I could get one from him. They inclosed his address and I wrote to him immediately. I had never forgotten that music in the night. The junk dealer said that he would be glad to sell me a bell, but suggested that I send some one out to listen to it to be sure it was all right.

I asked a musician friend of mine to go, and he gladly did. After he had passed favorably on the sound of the bell I negotiated with the junk dealer. The bell weighed over 100 pounds and I paid 40 cents a pound for it. Just come and listen to it."

The Woman crossed the brick porch and stepped out into the sunny garden. There the bell was hung high between two great blackened tree trunks. The bell itself was dusty nickel. The white-haired man reached up and pulled the long cord once and the bell gave out one low sweet notes. It was never the kind of note the Woman had heard in her disturbed slumbers. Perhaps her ear hadn't been tuned to detect sweetness the way the friendly old man's had.—New York Sun.

Tigers Breeding in Mexico

In 1913 a circus was wrecked in Mexico. A Bengal tiger and two tigresses escaped in the wreck and never were recaptured. In the 20 years since many little tigers have been born and reared in the mountains of the region where the three were first unintentionally liberated. They are at home in Mexico and display their traits, cunning, cruelty and large appetites for the flesh of other beasts. It is possible that in a century's time tigers will become common in Mexico.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Weather Dictionary

Some people collect stamps and some collect snuff boxes, but C. F. Talman, librarian of the United States weather bureau, is collecting words relating to the weather. His encyclopedic weather dictionary, when completed, will contain about 15,000 weather terms, including slang, dialect, and scientific names for weather phenomena. It may be some years before the dictionary is finished, but meanwhile each definition is filed on a card and the cards are in daily use as references for the scientists of the weather bureau and others.

WOMEN: watch your BOWELS

What should women do to keep their bowels moving freely? A doctor should know the answer. That is why pure Syrup Pepsin is so good for women. It just suits their delicate organism. It is the prescription of an old family doctor who has treated thousands of women patients, and who made a special study of bowel troubles.

It is fine for children, too. They love its taste. Let them have it every time their tongues are coated or their skin is sallow. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is made from fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other harmless ingredients.

When you've a sick headache, can't eat, are bilious or sluggish; and at the times when you are most apt to be constipated, take a little of this famous prescription (all drug stores keep it ready in big bottles), and you'll know why Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the favorite laxative of over a million women!

> THE STORY
>
> At nightfall, in the city of New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde, fleeing from gens de'armes, overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered and threatened, he fights, but is overpowered. Garde finds himself a prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, a ship bearing contraband arms and ammunition for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. An attempt to seize the ship fails. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked and Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. Making his way inland, he encounters a stranger awaiting the arrival of the Santa Lucrecia. He tells him of the wreck, and sees Dulce, with De Fuentes and Polito.

He pulled at his pipe, his broad shoulders shaking with laughter. "I am Monahan," he said at length, "Captain in the British legion under Gen. Simon Bolivar. The Liberator will be deeply interested when I tell him about the American Senor Garde, who loves the intended of Colonel de Fuentes and who rides the wings of the storm alone when his ship comes to grief. Bolivar can use such men, my friend."

There was a frank friendliness about this transplanted patriot, something that called for confidence, so I began with the Cabildo and completed my account with Tucayan, skipping only those portions which dealt with the Senorita Lamartina, and failing utterly in my deletions, for, when I had done, he said: "So the blond Loren will hie himself to Caracas, whither the dark beauty, his lady-love, is bound, and he will find there all the power of Spain in Venezuela against him."

"It is worth a try, at least," I said.

"Of course, but you go, not to a love tryst, but to fight a battle with death."

"I have fought such battles before, as you have also, no doubt; I have been too close to death in the past to fear it now."

He chuckled. "That yellow thatch of yours will sink you, for it cries your identity to all and sundry."

I touched my chin, which bore about a week's growth of corn-colored whisker. "I fear you are right; if you might suggest—?"

He picked up a stone and hurled it into the foliage of a near-by tree, and half a dozen objects resembling our huge green walnuts thudded to the ground. He crushed one under the heavy sole of a grenadier boot. "The juice of this pulp is an excellent dye," he explained; "it will make your hair and beard a very dark brown, and it will give to your too fair skin the deep bronze of a man who has spent his life with ships. As the pigment will last some weeks, you need have no fear of it fading before the Spaniards are prepared to hang you."

So, using a broad flat rock as a mortar, we crushed from the thick pulpy covering of a number of the half-ripe nuts a quantity of pale liquid, which, on drying, left my skin a reddish brown and my hair and beard nearly black.

"You have funds?" he questioned.

"None; the leathern wallet containing a small quantity of money and a few papers of purely personal value was taken from the pocket of my jacket while I lay unconscious on board the Santa Lucrecia. The good Francisco probably did it."

"Then," said Monahan, laughing, "as a friend of Francisco I would proffer such financial aid as you may require."

He placed ten silver pieces the size of our American dollar into my hand. "This will buy you a hat and clothes that shall be less identifying, and pay for food and quarters in Caracas for at least a fortnight." He sighed. "I think your need of food and quarters will hardly last so long." Then abruptly: "I—I cannot dissuade you from this mad mission?"

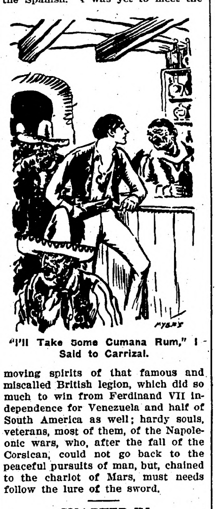
I shook my head, and he went on: "If Caracas is your goal I might tell you that, in the humble home of Senor Tomas Carrasco, which lies less than two hundred meters south of San Jacinto plaza, you will find safe lodgment, and in the Cantina Merida, presided over by the faithful Carrizal, a few patriots sometimes gather. I am sure that when you have had further opportunity to study the methods of Spain in Venezuela you will come to us, though you will need a vast amount of luck to get into Caracas and safely out again."

"And these few patriots who sometimes gather in the menage of Carrizal—how shall I know them?"

He extended his right hand, third finger folded into the palm. "That, in shaking hands, is the sign used by members of the Sociedad Patriotico, an organization founded by Simon Bolivar and Miranda nearly ten years ago."

He pressed my hand in a warm firm grip. "I think I shall not see you again. Too many forces are against you."

But he erred, for I was destined to fight, side by side, with Captain Monahan through a bitter campaign against the Spanish. I was yet to meet the moving spirits of that famous and miscalled British legion, which did so much to win from Ferdinand VII independence for Venezuela and half of South America as well; hardy souls, veterans, most of them, of the Napoleonic wars, who, after the fall of the Corsican, could not go back to the peaceful pursuits of man, but, chained to the chariot of Mars, must needs follow the lure of the sword.



"I'll Take Some Cumana Rum," I Said to Carrizal.

CHAPTER IV

A Wedding Disarranged

As I set out that morning on the road to Caracas, and on the road to adventures beyond my wildest dreams, the cool blue dome of the sky was unmarked by a cloud. The sun swung overhead and went swiftly down the western path as I trod the smooth stones that formed the road. The short twilight came and went, and a golden moon pushed above the timbered range that lay beyond Caracas. In the moonlight, I bent my steps toward the city, where I hoped to find the lady in white, the gracious lady who had come into my arms to find protection from the storm.

The city of Caracas, stronghold of Spain in Venezuela, and the key to its control, lies in a vast, fertile basin called the Vale of Aragon, the north rim of which forms a barrier between the city and the sea. As I came in sight of the city a morning sun, emerging from the mists of the east, touched the red-tiled roofs with gold. It was a city of beauty, a city of dreams; it held, for me, the present as well as the future. My mad worship would not permit me to consider the dangers that might beset me; I saw only the face of her whose life, I hoped, was to be bound up with mine for ever.

I had reached a tiny roadside store on the outskirts of the city before I realized that no plan had been made, no thought of what I might do after I had entered this, the headquarters of the Spanish forces in Venezuela. I went into the store, traded five silver pieces for clothes and the privacy of a room where I might change, and came out again garbed in the coarse, brown, two-piece suit and the blue, turban-like cap affected by many of the French sailors of the islands.

The road I had taken led to the Plaza San Jacinto, where I turned south and asked my way to the home of Tomas Carrasco, which proved to be a red and brown, rock and adobe structure of considerable size.

Tomas was non-committal; his dark eyes surveyed me with grave concern, and after assuring himself of my "strangeness," he announced sorrowfully but with unmistakable firmness that he had no quarters that might be offered to travelers. Expressing my disappointment in halting Spanish, I offered my hand in parting salute. As he grasped it, vastly relieved, I folded my third finger into the palm.

He gasped, his swarthy face went an ashen gray, and his sharp eyes searched my face. He turned my hand and studied it.

"There is a comfortable room for you, Senor, and food. A chiva, lately baked, frijoles, golden-brown tortillas, the sauce of papaya; fruit—luscious peaches from my own garden, oranges and melons from Coro, wine from Madeira, and rum from Cumana . . . and a house of safety, Senor. If there is anything you might require—"

"You are very kind, Tomas," I said.

A dozen listless loiterers sat at tables or leaned against the bar as I entered and made my way toward Carrizal, who stood behind the bar.

He considered me with the calculating eye of a man who anticipates a sale. I gave the subject of my order careful thought. I did not dare to ask for American whisky, and wine was still considered a European drink. While I pondered thus a familiar voice came to me: "There is no rum in all the world, Senor, like rum from Cumana."

"I'll take some Cumana rum," I said to Carrizal, as another voice agreed with the connoisseur of rum. The connoisseur, whose back was turned to me, turned at the sound of my voice, turned swiftly, the mug of rum poised between the bar and his face.

He opened a wide mouth that still showed traces of the bruises from my fist and let out a great laugh that fairly rattled the windows. "Senor Loco," he cried, "the sea has given up its dead!"

I stared, aghast, for Manuel stood before me; Manuel, who twice had stopped my fist with parts of his face, and who could, therefore, have had no love for me. My thoughts were racing wildly. Manuel belonged to Bolivar, yet the Spanish Captain Alvarez, according to the Senorita Dulce, had called him a good sailor . . . and Dulce had said he was stupid. Name of G—d! And here was Manuel in Caracas, drinking and visiting boldly in a saloon less than a square from the plaza; free in the city, as unconcerned as though he were strolling along the levee in the safe city of New Orleans

"Are you not mistaken, Senor?" I ventured. "Is there anything about me that should make you call me crazy?"

Now he went off into another convulsion of merriment. "Did the sea water dye thy whiskers," he roared, "and that yellow thatch of thine? Speak up, Senor Loco, and tell us how you came here—and why."

I had made an unpropitious entry into the stronghold of Spain. I had failed ere I had begun, and I had failed—by a grotesque twist of fate—because of the misplaced enmity of those who should have been my friends. Ah, well . . . I could, at least, show them the American indifference toward death.

"It is Manuel," I said, "no? Manuel, the sailor, who does not like the flavor of my fist." I smiled, extending my hand.

He, too, found my third finger folded into the palm. His mug of rum clattered to the floor, the grin disappeared from his face, and the evil light that had been in his eyes faded; he drew in a harsh, hissing breath and spat out a Spanish oath.

"Manuel," I cried, "has this fine Cumana rum touched your brain, or do you merely jest with a poor French sailor stranded at La Guaira, and seeking employment in Caracas?"

Manuel's left eyelid dropped, and raised quickly again, and his face was blank. "I think I should offer apology to you, Senor; I must have been in error, for you cannot be the Senor Loco whom I saw fall from the deck of the Santa Lucrecia. No man could have lived in that raging sea. Yet I have seen you somewhere, or perhaps the rum has put a fancy in my head."

One Letter He Did Not Mail

By CORONA REMINGTON

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service.)

"NOW, I'll be out of town Monday but I'll be back Tuesday morning and I'll call you. Maybe we could go to a show that night. Would you like to?"

"I'd love to go," she smiled up at him.

"That's a bargain then. I'll call you Tuesday. Good-by."

Big Jim Spearman pressed her hand lingeringly for a second and was gone. Constance Miller walked back into the living room after he had left and wondered what had happened. There was a strange loneliness about the place and yet a peculiar cheer, too. She felt somehow both the presence and the absence of his big wholesome personality.

"And he's going to call me Tuesday morning . . ." she whispered to herself. "Sunday, Monday . . ." she counted them off on her fingers "Only two days!"

"I believe he likes me a little—I honestly believe he does," she told her mirror as she stood in front of it brushing her hair for the night. "And just think, two weeks ago I didn't know him. I didn't even know him."

With the languid, preoccupied motions of one who is thinking of something else she finished her toilette at last and slid into bed. She was so sleepy yet so incredibly happy. "Tuesday . . . Tuesday . . . Tuesday." She wished she could stay awake all night just to think about it. The words floated around in her brain, now distinct, now dim, now distinct again. "Tuesday . . . Tue—" Down, down she sank into the land of Nod.

And when she awoke it was Sunday and time to get dressed for breakfast.

"Day after tomorrow!" That sounded so much nearer than Tuesday had the night before. "Day after tomorrow."

Sunday jogged along somehow. Breakfast, church, dinner, a long afternoon of piano and books, peaceful, informal, servantless supper. Leavings from the midday feast—chicken and dressing, sliced veal, jam and bread and butter, tea, scraps. Delicious.

And then Monday. Less time for dreaming. A hurried hour of piano practice, then the lesson and afterward more practice. The afternoon was filled with golf. And Tuesday—Constance decided to break her engagement with the dentist to stay home. He might telephone while she was gone. She practiced a little, then went to the window and looked out, she did not know what for. The telephone bell rang suddenly, sharply. With a start she picked it up, her heart beating strangely.

"Yes?" Her voice was athrill with expectancy.

"Hello, Conny, this is Margaret. . . ."

She could scarcely restrain herself. A tide of disappointment swept over her. That telephone bell rang again and again and each time she flew to it certain that it was he, only to find that it was some one else. The tension became unbearable, and that night she cried herself to sleep, one moment certain that he had been killed in some way or had fallen suddenly ill, the next moment certain that he was a flirt and had completely forgotten her.

Wednesday she decided to telephone to his office. But she hung up the receiver just as the operator asked for the number.

"No, if he can't take the trouble to call me he may go for all I care." (That was one of the moments when she was sure he was a flirt.)

Thursday was a replica of Wednesday—only worse, cumulative tension and disappointment adding to the pain.

Then came Friday and with the evening Jim Spearman appeared, cordial, debonair, conscienceless.

"Mighty glad to see you again."

"Well, where shall we go tonight?" She had not spoken a word as yet.

"I—I don't think we'll go. . . ."

"Why, Constance, you promised me tonight."

"I did not," she answered with spirit. "I promised you Tuesday night and Tuesday's been gone—a year!"

"But I sent you a special delivery explaining that I'd be detained and asking you to go tonight. I only got back an hour ago."

"It—it didn't come."

"Well, I mailed it. I put it in this pocket and mailed it Monday night at the post office myself." He slipped his hand into his pocket and pulled out—the letter. There it was stamped and sealed and addressed to her.

Limply he dropped into a chair—a big, pathetically crestfallen man. "Well, what on earth do you suppose I mailed that night anyway?"

It was all over. All the suffering and suspicion and doubt. Conny laughed the happiest rippling laugh.

"I can't imagine," she said, "but I know one thing—it wasn't my special delivery."

"Well, after we've been married a few years you'll find out what an absent-minded old man you have for a husband." He said it in the same cheery way he said everything else and with the same certainty—and he was right.

Hours later that night she turned over and over in joyful restlessness.

"Once explained, how understandable the ununderstandable is," she sighed happily.

Grain Went Wrong Way

James C. Garver remodeled a large building at Madison, Wis., to manufacture cattle feed. Friends were invited to witness its first production. Garver pushed a button. Wheels turned. Workmen poured great sacks of grain into hoppers, but nothing came out as the finished product. The building was searched from top to bottom without discovering where the grain was going. Garver went to the roof. There out of a ventilator spouted the mixture, and the wind scattered it afar. A workman had diverted the ground grain into the wrong pipe.

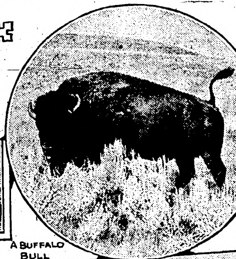
NEW MEAT for AMERICA'S MILLIONS

A HERD OF MUSK OXEN



A BUFFALO BULL

ROUNDING UP BUFFALO HERD IN YELLOWSTONE PARK

THE REINDEER

BY ELMO SCOTT WATSON

RECENTLY there came from Washington the news that the herd of buffalo in Yellowstone National park had grown so large that it would be necessary to reduce it in order to insure proper winter grazing for the remainder of the herd, which now numbers more than 1,200 animals. So the national park service of the Department of the Interior, which is custodian of the buffalo and other wild game in the park, announced that it would give away free to the first 100 applicants 100 buffaloes on the condition that these animals must not be killed, but must be used for exhibition or propagation purposes.

It was only a few years ago that America awoke to the fact that the buffalo had joined the class of "vanishing Americans" and that unless the necessary steps were taken this noble animal would be extinct. Of the millions which had once roamed the plains of the Great West only a pitiful remnant remained, in a few public parks and in the hands of private owners. Inbreeding was weakening the stock and it seemed only a matter of a few years before the buffalo must go the way of the passenger pigeon and other birds and animals which had been ruthlessly and wastefully slaughtered. Fortunately, however, public sentiment was aroused in time and steps were taken which guaranteed the preservation of the animals for the future.

This latest announcement from government officials indicates that the buffalo no longer need be classified as a "vanishing American" because recent years have seen a decided increase in the number of buffaloes now alive. Although their numbers will never be anywhere near the numbers which once inhabited this continent, the protection which the government has given to the survivors and its encouragement of their propagation in a scientific manner may mean that buffalo meat may again become a part of the regular American diet.

But more interesting than the possibilities suggested by the increasing number of buffalo is the action taken by the government in our greatest territory, Alaska, for guaranteeing the future meat supply of America's millions. Up there more than 1,000,000 reindeer now roam the frozen tundras of the north and it is estimated that by 1935 this number will be increased to almost 6,000,000. In fact, within the last two decades the raising of reindeer has grown to such proportions that now it is second only in importance to the fishing industry.

Reindeer were introduced to Alaska in 1891. In that year sixteen were brought from Siberia at the instigation of Dr. Sheldon Jackson. When Doctor Jackson was sent to Alaska by the government to establish schools among the natives, he found his wards threatened with starvation as a result of the slaughter by white men of the game animals on which the natives had depended for food. He conceived the idea of replacing the fast disappearing game with reindeer, the principal domestic animal of Lapland and Siberia, the climate and vegetation of which resembled that of Alaska.

Returning to the states and unable to interest congress in the venture. Doctor Jackson sought contributions from the public. He obtained $2,148 with which the first animals were procured in Siberia. At the same time Siberian herdsmen were brought over to care for them.

In 1892 150 more reindeer were imported. Congress then became mildly interested and small appropriations made possible importations through the next ten years until, in 1902, when the Russian government put an embargo on further exportations from Siberia, 1,280 animals had been taken into Alaska.

The Siberian herdsmen proved incompetent as teachers for the Eskimos, and for a time the venture was threatened with failure. It was then that Doctor Jackson went for advice to Prof. Rasmus B. Anderson of Madison, Wis., who, while minister to Denmark, had visited the reindeer herds of Lapland. Doctor Jackson's early interest had been aroused by a report on the industry there made by the professor.

In pursuance of Professor Anderson's advice, Lapp herders were engaged to replace the Siberians as instructors to the Eskimos. Each was lent 100 animals from the government herd for a period of years, at the end of which an equal number of reindeer were required to be returned to the government. The Lapps were permitted to retain the increase.

The Eskimos were apprenticed to the Lapps for a period of four years. At the end of the first year each was given six reindeer, at the end of the second, eight, at the end of the third year, ten, and ten more at the end of his fourth year of training. With normal increases, each man's herd would be almost 100 head by the time he had completed his apprenticeship. He was well equipped to start in business for himself. Today, more than two-thirds of the reindeer of Alaska are owned by natives, of whom some 5,000 have been trained in their care.

The effect of this training on the Eskimos is one of the most important results of the enterprise. Within less than a generation the reindeer industry has advanced the natives of Alaska through one entire stage of civilization—from the primitive to the pastoral, from nomadic hunters to civilized men, independent, responsible, assured of support for themselves and an opportunity to acquire wealth. They have bank accounts, purchase American clothing and food, have adopted improved methods of sanitation and, in some instances, have built frame houses from imported lumber.

Between 1918 and 1925 more than 1,875,000 pounds of reindeer meat was shipped to the United States from Alaska. Two hundred thousand pounds were shipped in 1923, while by 1925, the export had increased to 680,000 pounds. The export for 1927 was expected almost to double that of 1925, the amount depending on shipping facilities. Reindeer meat sells in Nome for 15 to 20 cents a pound. It can be delivered at Seattle for 15 cents a pound and, with increased shipments and improved methods of handling, even this price can be reduced.

While the only reindeer on this continent now are in Alaska, and the territory's production is restricted by pasturage to 4,000,000 head, there are millions of acres in Canada where ten times as many can be fed, and vast stretches in northern Europe and Asia where reindeer have been raised for centuries, but never on an extensive scale, where ten times as many can be grazed as in Canada. In all, 444,000,000 reindeer could be supported by Alaska, Canada and Eurasia, assuring a substantial contribution to the world's supply of food and a utilization of what otherwise would be waste land.

But the reindeer is not the only animal which the government is propagating in the great natural game preserve of Alaska. A more recent experiment is with musk-oxen, which have been introduced into Alaska in the hope that they may become re-established there.

In 1927 the legislature of the territory of Alaska petitioned congress for an appropriation for establishing an experimental herd of musk-oxen at the reindeer experiment station of the United States biological survey near Fairbanks. Under the leadership of Representative L. J. Dickinson of Iowa and Senator Peter Norbeck of South Dakota, a bill providing $40,000 for that purpose was finally passed in 1930 and signed by President Hoover.

With this money the Department of Agriculture went to work. A herd of 34 musk-oxen was obtained in Greenland in the fall of that year, was shipped from Greenland to Norway and then to New York by boat. Then they were sent by railway express from New York to Seattle, Wash., then by steamship to Seward, Alaska, and from Seward to Fairbanks they were taken by railroad, finally completing their long journey early this year. At Fairbanks they have been placed in a large enclosure where they are under the care of men acquainted with the peculiar problems of feeding, breeding and management of these animals under Alaskan conditions.

Evidently the first musk-oxen to be captured and transported alive from their native haunts were taken on an island near Greenland around 1899. These were shipped to Norway and later sold for exhibition at a park at Woburn, England. The first to reach this country were delivered at New York in 1902, and were exhibited at the New York Zoological park. A number of others were imported during succeeding years.

It is the hope of the biological survey of the Department of Agriculture that the musk-oxen may be successfully domesticated and that their numbers may be increased to utilize a large part of the vast feeding resources of Alaska which are largely wasted. If the experiment succeeds and the musk-oxen increase, it may mean a valuable source of supply of meat and valuable robes, as well as other products

Musk-oxen are the most truly Arctic of all the large mammals in North America, according to Paul G. Redington, chief of the United States biological survey. At the time of the earliest exploration of the Arctic musk-oxen inhabited the vast territory north of the great transcontinental forest, roaming from the northwestern shores of Hudson bay to the Mackenzie river and over most of the Arctic islands and northern Greenland. They formerly existed in some numbers in northern Alaska. There seems to be no authentic records of their occurrence within the territory since its exploration by Europeans, though some of the natives state that their grandfathers killed them in the region south of Point Barrow, and their skulls and other bones are still occasionally picked up on the tundra.

It seems probable that the relatively small areas north of the tree limit could not support sufficient numbers to withstand the demands made on them by the surrounding natives. Musk-oxen also disappeared long ago from northern Europe and Asia. Fortunately, they have persisted to the present time in limited numbers in northern Canada, eastern Greenland, and some of the Arctic islands, though they are much reduced from their former numbers. The Canadian government for the past several years has been making vigorous efforts to preserve the remnant of these animals, having established several reservations for them, one of the most important of which is the Thelon sanctuary, east of Great Slave lake in Northwest Territories. There about 250 musk-oxen still exist, where adequate range had been set aside for them, and the most effective protection possible is being afforded in the hope that they may not only maintain themselves but also increase materially in numbers.

In appearance musk-oxen resemble somewhat a small-sized buffalo, or bison, to which they are probably more nearly akin than to any other American animal. There is a distinct hump on their shoulders, although it is not so conspicuously developed as in the bison, and the head is carried high when the animal is on the alert. Their general color is dark brownish-black, with a lighter brown or cream color on the back, and the legs are much lighter colored.

Both sexes in the musk-ox have horns, which in the mature bulls are massive, coming together at the forehead and descending on each side of the head, and then turning sharply upward and ending in sharp points. The horns in the female are similar but more slender. These weapons are exceedingly effective against the wolf, which is the musk-ox's only natural enemy. In their ordinary movements the animals are usually slow and deliberate, but they can develop astonishing speed, especially when attacked. The animals tend to group themselves into herds, and in defending themselves against the attacks of the wolves they bunch up in close formation with heads ranged outward, forming an irregular circle. When attacked they paw the ground, bellow, and with lowered heads make quick dashing charges for short distances and then return into formation. The young and immature animals are thus defended from attack by the stronger and more aggressive adults.

The meat of these animals is reported to be of excellent quality, similar to beef or buffalo meat when properly dressed at the right season of the year. The fact that the musk-oxen formerly roamed the treeless coastal plains of Alaska and the information obtained in range investigations conducted by the biological survey offer abundant evidence that the forage there is suitable for their use. Animals kept in captivity have fed readily and thrived on hay and carrots and other root crops. Hence, their domestication is particularly desirable as a means of providing a meat-producing animal that can utilize the natural forage and the kinds of cultivated foods that can be produced in abundance in Alaska. Climatic conditions in Alaska are such that the agricultural development of the territory must depend upon production of special types of animals adapted to such environment. The present attempt, therefore, to reintroduce musk-oxen into Alaska and to domesticate them with a view to restocking suitable ranges appears to be timely, and as they will subsist largely on range forage different from that consumed by reindeer and are adapted to live under different and exceedingly rigorous conditions, they should supplement well the present rapid development of the reindeer industry. The tendency of the animals to bunch up during feeding and not to wander far away from their established ranges should make them readily herded and managed and well adapted to handling conditions that will be necessary on the great Alaskan ranges.

PASSING OF THE HORSE

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THE passing of the horse is a phenomenon to which this generation has become more or less accustomed. Already in wide areas of the urban sections of Europe, North and South America, the tractor and the countless steam and electrical driven devices for farming the face of the earth, have lessened his importance in vast agricultural belts the world over.

Upon the Grady family, the passing of the horse was to make its deep and lasting impression. A family long inured to the paddock, the stables, the coachman's box, the racing stable, suddenly was finding itself on ground as shifting as quicksands.

For seventy-five years, one Grady or another had been stationed at a hack stand, tending stallions in private racing stables, or engaged in work that had to do, either directly or indirectly, with horses.

For twenty years Michael Grady, whose grandfather and father before him had occupied his same kind of throne, had sat in the box of a well-groomed four-wheeler of a cab, plying his rapidly dwindling trade from station to hotel; from hotel to botanical gardens, aquarium, art gallery and points of general interest. There was a residium of local trade left, too. A handful of the older families who still sent for Michael for theater, dinner party or park drives as they had sent for his father and grandfather before him.

But for the most part, for an appallingly major part, the calls now came for the taxicabs and service cars parked around the large hotel.

There were not half a dozen horse cabs left in town. And of them Michael's was by far the most presentable. The remaining four or five were of thirty and thirty-five years ago, and so were their drivers.

Not so with Michael. He was forty and as alert and up and coming in his interests and desires as any of the taxicab and private car chauffeurs about the town. It was just that, as he put it, he had stepped into his old Pap's shoes and found them to his liking.

"Give me a horse every time, with a spirit to him, and a warm sociable muzzle to him and a knowing eye and a friendly heart, to an iron devil with petrol in his veins."

The taxi men were jocular about this and agreed upon the kingship of the horse and admired Michael's well-shod, well-groomed, kindly, disciplined chestnut mare, but when it came to regarding her seriously as a means of transportation—why—better wake up, Mike, the Civil war is over.

Michael knew all this. He knew that his tenacity branded him as old-fashioned and passe as the old museum pieces of cabbies who drowsed all day on their boxes in the square, and fiercely, Michael, who had youth and pride in him, resented the indictment.

He was neither passe nor old fashioned; he would ride in a taxi with the best of them, regarded it as the important innovation it was; conceded everything the fellows said about it, but that didn't make him any the less master of his own soul. And Michael's soul was the soul of a coachman. The proper opening to his day was to walk into the stable and feel his Hotspur nuzzle over her bin to greet him. Part of the very rhythm of his being was the clip-clop of his ten-year-old over the asphalt of the city streets, her tall glossy, because he had made it so, mane flowing, pace so even that nurses from the hospital had formed the habit of summoning Michael for a patient's first drive after an operation.

Michael had no backward point of view regarding modern devices, especially the automobile. His ideas had to do solely with his own personal preferences and in spite of the increased remuneration that a man could expect from driving a taxicab, Michael stuck to his guns. Or rather to his horse.

For twenty years, he withstood the tests of time, increasing rigors of traffic, pressure of the taxi men who were forever chaffing him, and maintained his coachman's seat. In that time there had only been three horses, Hotspur at six years, standing strong and in her prime.

It is doubtful that even in the end Michael would have capitulated to the pressure of the age in which he lived, except for an immemorial reason. He fell in love and with his eye on marriage, felt the need of a larger income.

The girl Roselle, so enchantingly up-to-the-moment in her slim young boyishness, docked head, quick restless eyes, eager voice, was simply not the sort you could imagine sitting demurely behind the shining flanks of even the personable Hotspur.

Roselle, wooed by practically every taximan at the stand; the darling delight of the traveling salesmen who crowded around her telephone operator's desk in the hotel, was the personification of the age of the darting motor, the jangling telephone, the circling airplane.

Nothing short of miracle, at least in his eyes, was the fact that of all the milling admirers about this phantom of delight, her glance should fall, linger and conclude by adoring Michael, fifteen years her senior and belonging to the back-rank and file of the almost extinct coachmen.

Naturally, it was here that her influence entered most violently. Within two weeks after the bewildering knowledge that Roselle was in love with him, the two of them, hand in hand, like children, had sought out the school for automobile drivers, where Michael was enrolled for evening work. Two weeks later, his first payment of his nest egg of five hundred dollars was made on an orange-colored, slightly used taxicab, and three months later a newly licensed chauffeur, in a natty cravenette suit, leggings and cap, was doing his test driving on a speedway just outside the town.

It was by all odds the most exciting event that had ever entered his life, and to mitigate what might have been the pain of it, Hotspur was to be relegated for light farm work to the truck garden of an uncle of Roselle's, where the pair, when they were wedded, could visit him of a Sunday.

It was all, as Roselle put it, just too hotsy-totsy for anything, except that the slip-up came where not even her sharp foresight could have ever anticipated it.

One week before the wedding of Michael and Roselle, and that same one week before Michael was to assume his permanent place on the taxicab, Roselle staged a party.

It was a pretentious affair, given in the back yard of the little house on the outskirts of town which Roselle shared with parents and a brood of small brothers and sisters. There were colored paper lanterns strung on clothes line. Dancing on the back porch, to ukelele music supplied by some of Roselle's old flames among the taxi boys. Strawberries and cream and homemade ginger bread passed by Roselle's perspiring mother and smaller brothers and sisters.

It was toward the end of the evening, after Michael and Roselle had been obliged by their warmed-up guests to dance a fandango, that the real novelty of the occasion took place.

Led into the back yard by four of Roselle's little brothers and sisters, head down, tail down, eyes down, was Hotspur! Hotspur, mind you, rigged up in a white lace ruff, and a beribboned sunbonnet and a large veil of lace curtain caught by orange blossoms at the neck.

Hotspur, the sweet-eyed, delicate-nostriled, satin-flanked Hotspur, standing there abashed by the ribaldry, quivering under ridicule, defamed by geegaws!

It seemed to Michael, seeing it happen, as if his heart had stopped and with it his desire to ever live again.

Crackling laughter about him, Roselle clapping her hands and skipping about the dejected figure of Hotspur; the guests applauding this latest coup of their piquant little hostess; it came over Michael suddenly that here in this humiliating moment probably resided blessing. Here, in this moment of hurting for Hotspur, there came to him the impossibility of what he was about to do.

Michael belonged on his box, behind Hotspur. Roselle, bless her, belonged to that age out there. A good enough age if you knew what it was all about, only Michael, for the life of him, somehow could not figure out the need of rush through time to the jangling of telephone bells, the whirring of motors and zipping of planes.

Feeling that way about it all, bleeding at heart for Hotspur, the rest of his decision came quickly.

Michael is back on his box now, the last coachman in the square. He still drives for the older families and the nurses at the hospital still have a way of sending for him when they want their patients to enjoy a tranquil drive behind the restful old Hotspur.

He has even driven Roselle and her husband about on two occasions, when she was a patient at the hospital after the birth of her babies.

Trip to Middle Ages

To be in Italy in the summer time and not see the Race of the Contrade, or Palio of Siena, is dire misfortune. The medieval pageant, of which the race in the chief square of the city is the glorious climax, occurs in August. With a blare of trumpets the grand procession enters and proceeds slowly around the great Piazza del Campo, a glittering, colorful equestrian spectacle of the 17 Contrade of Siena. After many skillful displays of flag furling and catching, the wild excitement of the race comes, and in a moment it is finished and you return from the Middle ages to today.

Ownership of Wind

In old days in England the question of who owned the wind was frequently disputed. A wind or water-mill had "soke" rights, which meant that everyone living in the manor had to send their flour to it to be ground. A mill being rooted in the soil belonged to whoever owned the soil. Therefore, the wind belonged to the miller or his landlord.

How It Started—By Jean Newton

"The Boston Burglar"

I was born in Boston, a city we all know well;
Brought up by honest parents, the truth to you I'll tell;
Brought up by honest parents, and raised most tenderly,
Till I became a sporting man, at the age of twenty-three.

There are many schools—or perhaps the proper word is cycles—of popular music.

Songs are written, published, and apparently become popular in bunches.

So, in the early development of the popular song, the theme was almost always patriotism.

The advent of the steamboat furnished the impetus to songs dealing with boating, water travel and marine life generally.

The railroad inspired a host of songs featuring the engineer, the fireman, locomotive life and railroad doings.

The circus, too, was productive of a school of songs portraying the trials, tribulations, joys and thrills connected with the existence of its ballyhooed performers.

And last but not least we have the school of crime songs, of which a typical composition was "The Boston Burglar."

The author of "The Boston Burglar" was said to be M. J. Fitzpatrick. It was a good song and quite popular in its day. It had a ballad-like rhythm that caught the transient fancy of those who liked that sort of thing. And long after most songs of its kind were consigned to the land of forgotten tunes, "The Boston Burglar" continued to be sung, both for pleasure and as a warning to the young, as the last stanza so eloquently implores:

All you who have your liberty, pray keep it if you can,
And don't go 'round the streets at night to break the laws of man,
For if you do you'll surely rue, and find yourself like me,
Who is serving out a twenty-year term, in the penitentiary.

Chamois leathers that are used for cleaning silver require frequent washing. The simplest way to do this is to squeeze them through the hands in warm water and soapsuds, to which a few drops of ammonia have been added, till quite clean, changing the water if necessary. Rinse in warm soapsuds and hang out to dry, rubbing the leather through the hands a few times before it is dry to soften it. If rinsed in clear water leathers get hard.

OF INTEREST TO THE HOUSEWIFE

Marrow Bone Soup.—Get a good-sized marrow bone, leaving on some of the meat, split and wipe with a damp cloth. These bones may be bought in most markets for ten to twenty cents. Cover with plenty of cold water (two or three quarts) if the bones are large. Bring to a slow simmer and cook at low temperature for three to four hours, so that all the extractives are well dissolved in the water. Season with salt and pepper, strain and set away. For a vegetable soup put carrots, a bit of cabbage, celery and onion with a potato or three into a kettle with boiling water. Cook until nearly tender, then add some of the broth, season well and serve. Use the broth unseasoned except with salt and pepper, as it will keep for several days in the ice chest. Adding the vegetables will increase the chance of spoilage. The meat may be cut into small pieces and served with the vegetable as a stew, as all its nutriment except the extractives which give it flavor are still in it.

Eggs a la King.—Cook the eggs, allowing one and one-half egg to each person. Cook them in boiling water closely covered, one pint of water to each egg. Leave thirty minutes on the back of the stove, not where they will even simmer, but keep the heat that is in the water. In thirty minutes the egg will be cooked to the center, the white tender and the yolk mealy. If eggs are taken from ice chest and very cold add extra water. For six eggs take three tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour; when bubbling hot add the flour and stir until smooth, add two cupfuls of rich milk and cook until smooth. Add green pepper that has been parboiled, half a can of mushrooms and the eggs cut into quarters.

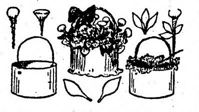
Basket to Make

Would you like to make a new kind of basket?

Take the bottom of some small, round cardboard box, one which has been used for face powder or ice cream, or even a large paper nut cup is fine. Punch two small holes, one at either side of the box and into each one put the end of a six-inch piece of picture wire. This is the handle of your basket.



Cut a narrow strip of crepe paper and wind this about the handle. Wrap several small round hard candies in circles of different colored paper. Twist a piece of small wire around the ends of these circles. Then cut your leaves according to the pattern, and paste them on the wired stem. Now wind narrow strips of green crepe paper about the stems of the very ends and your candy flowers are complete. The number of flowers needed depends upon the size of your basket.

Line the sides of your basket inside with a lace doily, taking care that the "lacey" part appears about the top edge of the box. Then fill the bottom of the basket with sawdust or sand, and stick the stems of the candy flowers into this. Cover the sawdust with scraps of green paper or a piece of wax paper. Now the flowers do really look as if they were growing in the basket. And they will keep fresh for a long time.

Next cut your outside frill, as shown in the illustration, and paste around the outside of the basket. If you wish you can add a small bow of satin ribbon to the handle. This basket will prove very attractive if shades of yellow, light blue, and pink are used for the flowers, green for leaves and stems, and lavender for outside and handle.

Lights of New York

Mr. and Mrs. Bugs Baer are ardent crossword puzzle fans. Mrs. Baer is pretty good at these puzzles but she was absolutely astounded at the skill, speed and brainwork shown by her husband. Together they would do the puzzle published in a certain New York paper and they never were more than child's play for Mr. Baer. If ever she was stuck for a word, he instantly supplied it. Mrs. Baer took a wholesome pride in her husband's remarkable ability until it accidentally came to light that Mr. Baer was obtaining advance proofs of the puzzles at the newspaper office, working them out at his leisure, and then doing them over at home. Mr. Baer has lost prestige.

Arthur William Brown, the illustrator, and Le Roy P. Ward, the architect, had a miraculous escape from injury or death recently while driving back from East Hampton, Long Island, to New York. The road was crowded with rapidly moving cars. Mr. Ward was at the wheel of his own automobile, with Mr. Brown in the seat beside him. Suddenly a driver swung out of the line coming the other way. Mr. Ward wrenched the wheel but barely prevented a head-on collision. The other car struck his car on the side, pushed it 20 feet, and overturned it in the ditch. It crashed to its side with Mr. Brown on the under side. Now comes the miracle. The car was badly smashed, windshield, fenders, running boards and windows. Yet, when they were pulled out, neither Mr. Ward nor Mr. Brown was more than slightly bruised and the glasses Mr. Brown was wearing were not even broken.

A friend of mine entered an automat near Seventy-second street and was thoroughly surprised to find it fairly well filled with men with canes and spats. A few even had monocles through which they made a careful examination of the ready dishes before parting with their nickels. The only way in which my friend was able to account for this clientele was to assume that the customers were officers of the former Bank of United States, which had branches in this vicinity before the parent stem and all branches withered. This automat, by the way, is one of the few New York eating places which bars smoking. A nonsmoking rule is hard to enforce, not because of the men, but because of the women, a far more independent sex.

Dr. Frederick W. Hodge tells me of a veteran entomologist who entered the Explorers' club in great excitement. He was pounding a folded newspaper against his hand.

"Did you see?" he asked. "Did you see the Colorado river has overflowed?"

"Yes," answered someone. "It is terrible about the poor people who have lost their homes."

"People!" said the scientist. "What concern have I with people? It is the bugs."

It seems that he had discovered some new variety of insect in the district which now was flooded. Well, it's all in the point of view.

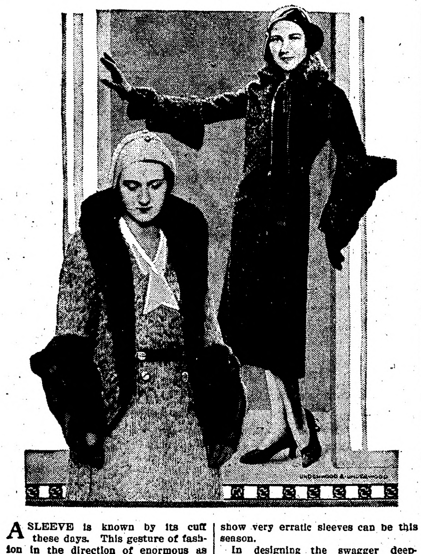
There's No Limit as to Huge Cuffs

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



A SLEEVE is known by its cuff these days. This gesture of fashion in the direction of enormous as well as very fanciful cuffs is confined neither to coat or frock, but every type of garment be it wrap, gown or blouse, if it has long sleeves, gives conspicuous expression to highly ornate and out-of-the-usual cuff silhouettes.

Take it in the matter of the smartest daytime frocks made either of the swanky sheer woolens or of voguish silk crepes or of velvet, it is their whimsical elbow-length lace and lingerie cuffs which are their pride and their glory. These may or may not be an actual part of the dress, for while many of their sleeves adopt to-the-elbow cuffs made of self or contrast materials, it is just as likely that the cuffs are detachable, for the neckwear departments are a revelation in the way of "sets" which include cuffs with a daring flare which extends halfway up the arm, together with novel and elaborate neckpieces.

However, when it comes to calling attention to out-of-the-ordinary cuffs it is the now-so-modish fur-trimmed cloth suit and the furred long coat, likewise the all-fur wrap which are carrying away the honors. Judging from the latest models there is no limit as to how far a cuff shall be permitted to wander toward the top of the sleeves. In some instances not even the elbow is recognized as a stopping place. Frequently the effect is more that of a half-sleeve either contrasting two kinds of material or two kinds of fur or forming the upper portion of the sleeve of cloth with fur meeting it at or above the elbow. Which goes to show very erratic sleeves can be this season.

In designing the swagger deep-cuffed sleeve the very fashionable flat furs such as astrakhan, Persian lamb, galyak, seal and gray kidskin which is the rage at the present moment, nor should dyed lapin or ermine be omitted from the list, are manipulated like fabric with all sorts of intriguing dressmaker touches. We must not neglect to mention in this connection the very smart spotted furs such as leopard and ocelot, for they are immensely popular.

It is interesting also to note how deftly sable, mink and other similar types are sewed row and row to form bell or huge puff effects which reach often to beyond the elbow.

The jacket suit and the long fur coat in the picture tell the story of that which is new in cuffs in a thoroughly up-to-date manner. The suit is really a three-piece in that the jacket tops a dress rather than merely a skirt. It is, of course, styled of one of the fascinating novelty woolens such as is causing the world of fashion to stop and admire. The fur which trims it is seal. Furriers are very enthusiastic in regard to sealskin this season.

The black astrakhan coat shown to the right is a Lanvin model. It features straight conservative lines and elbow cuffs. The tie of black velvet is an interesting item. In their most recent collections Paris couturiers are stressing not only velvet scarfs, but on their frocks of every material they are positioning at strategic points great soft-tied velvet bows either in contrasting or self-color.

SLEEVES TO BEAR BURDEN OF STYLE

By its cuffs shall you know it—as a frock or jacket of this season's crop. Sleeves carry the burden of much of the mode this year.

First we had oversleeves with long narrow cuffs, then puffed sleeves or arms covered with fabric cut on wholly correct leg-o-mutton lines. Now come wide cuffs, bishop's sleeves and other cuffy glories.

There's no doubt about it, there is a picturesque note about the wide cuff whether it be on frock or coat and it is especially luxurious when it is fur banded, as it is being done this season. Then, too, the glove gets a chance to expose its crinkled, or wrinkled surface with grand eclat and effect.

Wide cuffs of white are very good with black frocks and they give even the largest, most utilitarian hand a soft, delicate appeal. And that's something when hands have been gripping tennis racquets or golf clubs through the years.

Feather Trimmed Frocks Spring Into Popularity

With the advent of the feather trimmed hat, it is not surprising that many designers are now showing frocks with feather trimming a dominant feature.

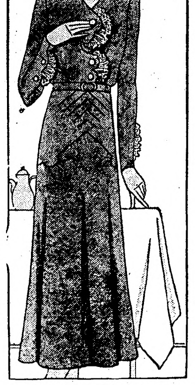
The hem seems to be assuming additional importance with the introduction of fur-edged borders and now, with feather edges, too. Of course, such a frock is not meant for the woman who has to watch her wardrobe expenditures; it is rather for the fortunate woman who can afford one or two extra gowns.

A feather-trimmed frock quite plainly demands perfection in detail, accessories and grooming, or else the effect would, most likely be more sad than scintillating.

Muffs on Scarfs

Scarf muffs are a new Paris wrinkle for fall. Wool scarfs to match street frocks are tipped with double bands of fur at the ends which serve the wearer as a muff.

LIGHTWEIGHT WOOL



A frock in lightweight wool is one of the smartest frocks of the season, especially when it has the added touch of frilling. For just as sheer wool dresses top the mode so, too, does the organdie frill that can be left off to suit the occasion.—Woman's Home Companion.

Earrings for You

Ball-shaped earrings add breadth to your face, and long tapering ones will give a short full face the appearance of being much longer.

STOP THAT COUGH!

Bronchitis is increasingly prevalent at this season. Alone, it is seldom serious, although the cough may be very annoying. But the serious side of Bronchitis and other mild infections of the lungs and throat is that the inflamed tissues may be invaded by some far more serious organism, particularly Pneumonia.

This is a real danger in most cases. It is the best of reasons why a bronchial cough or an attack of laryngitis should be stopped as quickly as possible.

The quick effective way to check these troubles is to apply B. & M., The Penetrating Germicide, three times a day, spreading it over the entire chest and throat. Usually the first application will bring out a reddish flush showing where the trouble is.

B. & M. is obtainable from most druggists. If yours cannot supply it, send his name and $1.25 for a large-size bottle sent postpaid. Helpful booklet free on request. F. E. ROLLINS COMPANY, 53 Beverly St., Boston, Mass.—Adv.

Unusual Fertility

If producing unusual things is any indication of land's fertility, the farm land around West Memphis, Ark., must be unusually fertile. J. W. Stotts went to his garden to gather vegetables. Pulling a radish, he found that it was a twin radish, two well-developed radishes growing together. He next gathered tomatoes and found quadruplet tomatoes. Encouraged by that, Mr. Stotts next picked cabbage and harvested one with seven heads.—Exchange.

Cosmetics and Beauty Lotions Among Indians

Although the forest was her drug store the brown-skinned Indian maiden suffered no lack of cosmetics and beauty lotions. Some of those used among the Thompson Indians of the Pacific Northwest are recorded in the annual report of the bureau of American ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution.

"When washing," says the report, "a girl must stick four needles of the yellow pines into the flesh under her arms until it bleeds. At the same time she prays that her armpits and all her skin will always smell sweet. Frequently a girl will wash her face and head with a decoction of the tops of the yellow pine, believing that this will give her a smooth, fair skin and an abundance of hair.

"A young girl would frequently wash her face and head with a decoction of the stems and flowers of the wild flax. She believed this would give her a wealth of hair and a beautiful face.

"Branches of the great silver fir were used each morning by the young girl in stroking her head and back. She prayed at the same time that these parts of her body would never tire of carrying burdens. Her legs and feet were also stroked with the fir branches so that they might not tire when she was walking long distances. During her period of training the girl was supplied with two large branches of the fir tree and she had to pick the needles off one by one, praying that she would never be lazy. Also four large fir branches were so placed before her hut that going in and out she had to step over them. She would do so saying: 'If I ever step into trouble or step unknowingly into the magic spell of some person, may you help me, O fir branches, with your power!'"

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of $1157.20, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by John W. Eells and Edith Eells, his wife, Mortgagors, to Chistopher Graham, Mortgagee, bearing date the 22nd day of April, 1926, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 24th day of April, 1926, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., in Book 111 of Mortgages, on page 254, and no action or proceedings having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said Mortgage or any part thereof.

NOW, THEREFORE, NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That by virtue of the power of sale contained in said Mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said Mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said Mortgage, viz:

The Southwest Quarter (SW¼) of Section Eight (8), in Township One Hundred Fifty-five (155) North, of Range Forty (40) West, of the Fifth Principal Meridian, containing 160 acres, according to the United States Government Survey thereof, in Marshall County and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Marshall County at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Warren, in said County and State, on the 12th day of December, 1931, at 10:00 o'clock A. M., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt of $1157.20, and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and $50.00 Attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said Mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Limestone Spreader

A limestone spreader, owned by a bank in Illinois is rented out to farmers for ten cents a ton, and also a phosphate spreader at five cents a ton. The "limestone project" was the principal contribution of the bank to banker-farmer work, during 1930, and was carried on in cooperation with the Farm Bureau. A man trained in the testing of soil, and in the making of soil maps was employed by the bank. The unit maps used covered forty acres, on which 23 surface tests were made at mathematical points. At five other points three tests were made—surface, sub-surface, and sub-soil. The completed map showed, by varying shadings of red, the points which needed limestone. Arrangements were also made by the bank to have limestone shipped in in car lots for sale to farmers in any quantities needed.

Freezing Weather--- and Your Cream

Be careful of your cream, now that cold weather is with us again. Frozen cream will not produce Land O'Lakes butter, as freezing breaks down the butterfat granules and causes the butter made from it to taste grainy as though it contained cornmeal. Particles of ice may also cause a lower test than the cream would ordinarily have.

Protect your cream from freezing.

Many Moose Seen

Several big game hunters from the big cities in Minnesota and from neighboring states have passed thru here lately, coming back from the wilds of Canada. Some of these hunters have displayed some fine deers and big moose shot up in that country.

On Wednesday two hunters passed thru here with two big moose that looked like a couple of horses. Yes, we saw them and we too believed the hunters who said that each one weighed sixteen hundred pounds. That is some stake for Christmas.

But one old timer here doubted their word that the had shot such big moose themselves and, went as far as to ask one of them if he knew Svenke up in Canada. Say, this gave us an idea. Maybe he is still going after the big Monarchs of the woods and, still better, it put us back on the track of that story about the big ride Svenke took on a prize hunt twenty years ago this fall.

We found it in our files and are reprinting it for sport and dedicate it to Svenkeson up at Foxford, Alberta, Canada where the call of these giants of the hoofed tribe echo or the hill tops.

Rode Bull Moose To Death

When it comes to exciting experiences in hunting big game we believe that Svenke Svenkeson can lay claim to the prize thriller for northern Minnesota.

Svenke was out after big game and was accompanied by Hans and John Stensrud. They had wandered quite a distance into Beltrami county before they met up with the big chief of the moose tribe. Svenke made up his mind that he wanted the moose's head but the moose was in no hurry to part with it. The moose stamped at Svenke and whistled, and Svenke and his companions dodged behind convenient tress and proceeded to fill the bull's hide with lead. That kind of treatment was sickning to the moose and he ambled off to a quiet spot and lay down to sleep. But he had not correctly estimated Svenkeson's bloodthirsty nature nor the longing his beautiful horns had inspired. Svenke crept upon him as he lay and, jumping on his neck, attempted to cut his throat. No self respecting moose could be expected to tamely submit to such an insult and assault. This one was plain scared and ran for his life. Svenke was scared too, but the moose did not know it. He had stradled the animal's neck and went into the air and through it at an awful pace with his left arm entwined in the antlers he coveted. He did not say whether he held on so tight because he was afraid to let go or not. He owns up to have said what fragments of his prayers he could remember and then calling the moose pet names in nine different languages. A little later the Stensrud boys came upon a big moose lying dead with Svenke looking vainly for the knife which a gaping wound in the bull's throat showed had caused his death. They proceeded to sever the head and found that Svenke had landed an uppercut with his knife thru the bull's neck and right into his spine a little back of the ears. He had the head mounted and was very proud of it. Svenke has always since this trip, said that it was the meanest ride he had ever been given,

The English III class has began studying literature. The first play to be studied is the "Tempest" by Shakespeare. Themes on Shakespeare life were also written.

We have been studying the Jacksonian period in American History.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

The 7th grade ggeography class has been divided into two teams. We are working hard to see which team can do better work.

The 6th graders received three very interesting letters from pupils in the Hufnagel Mittelschule at Frankfort-on-Main, Germany. In one of the letters we were told that all boys and girls in their schools were in separate classes. They said that on every Monday they have school in the evening and also told us many other interesting things. Their letters were written in good English.

New officers for the little Citizens league will be elected on Friday afternoon.

Our room sold $5.15 worth of Christmas seals.

Gertie Johnson has been recess officer during the past two weeks.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The 5th grade geography class after studying the corn growing states in the north Central States, tested corn. Their corn test was successful.

The third grade pupils have been running a spelling race withe the second grade. The third grade had the highest average last week.

The fourth graders have been running a spelling contest with the fifth grade. The 4th grade had the highest average last week.

1st & 2nd GRADES

We have put up a few of our Christmas decorations. We have made Holy wreaths, Santa Claus Angel heads, and, Madonna pictures.

The following children are on the honor roll.

Second grade.

LeRoy Fredrickson, Russel Sanoden and Lois Hanson.

First Grade. Ruth Halvorson, Ruby Halvorson and Stanley Haukeness.

We have been busy practicing for our Christmas program.

Last Friday Mrs. Victor Johnson and Betty visited in our room.

On Friday Betty Lou Lorentson and Ruby Halvorson had 100 in spelling. This week we are all trying for 100's in order that we may beat the third grade.

The Election

The annual Village election held here on Tuesday was a quiet affair and only forty-seven voters turned out to cast their ballot.

H. O. Hanson was elected to serve as president of the village Council. He succeeds Hjalmer Peterson who has held the position since in March 1929. Harry Engen was elected as councilman for three years. F. K. Fredrickson was elected as Justice of the Peace for two years and O. J. Backlund as Justice for one year.

Hjalmer Peterson was elected Constable for two years and Albert Haglund for one year.

The other members of the council are: C. L. Sandberg, Sam Lorentson, Geo. Fricker and A. L. Carlson.

F. K. Fredrickson and son Orrin, and H. O. Hanson made a trip to Kidred, N. D., Saturday returning home Sunday evening. Orrin remained there to be employed at the home of his uncle, Christ Erickson.

Two-Headed Steer

Seven months old and bred from pedigreed stock, a steer which has just been taken to Melbourne, Australia, is a freak in many ways. One is that it has two heads, another is that it uses both, but only one when eating. The two heads meet at the center of the forehead. The animal has four ears, four horns, but lost the sight of one pair of eyes six weeks ago. A showman paid a farmer $500 for it.

THE STORY

In the city of New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered. Garde finds himself a prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, ship bearing arms and ammunition for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked and Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. He encounters a stranger and sees Dulce with De Fuentes and Polito. Learning his history, the stranger, who is Captain Monahan of the British legion under Bolivar, urges Garde to join the Venezuelans, but his mind is set on again seeing Dulce. Monahan directs him to friends in Caracas. There Garde, supplied by Monahan with the secret sign of the patriots, is welcomed at the revolutionary headquarters.

Clever rogue! He knew that the encircling loiterers, most of whom were doubtless Spanish sympathizers, must be appeased, so he had delivered the task of lying over to me. Now Pedro Carrizal broke in again: "Yes, Senor Frenchman, tell us where you saw our amiable Manuel, and tell us why he dislikes the flavor of your fist."

"Assuredly," said I, mixing mendacity and truth; "we had some words at La Guaira, and Manuel's knife, by chance, was slower than my fist; therefore my lungs are still intact, while his teeth, as you might see, are hardly company front."

The swarthy sailor offered a sour smile at this, and the crowd, laughing, went back to card games and drinks again.

Manuel turned to Carrizal and bestowed another wink. "I would speak with this fellow sailor privately, Pedro." Whereupon the bartender ushered us through a massive door and closed it after us; and Manuel, standing with his back against it, drew a gleaming knife from his belt.

"How come you here, Senor? I saw you fall into the sea."

"The sea was kind to me, Manuel, as well as the wind—and that knife you hold might still be slower than my fist."

"Your life is forfeit in Caracas, Senor Garde. When that dye has been removed the Colonel Fuentes will be pleased to see you, for he loves you not at all; neither will the cause of revolution suffer in your passing."

'And when I tell him of my masquerade as San Isidro in New Orleans, and what I saw and heard?"

Manuel swore, and then laughed. "Your interest, I think, is not with Venezuela, nor with Spain."

"Never Spain, Manuel, for I have looked upon the dead city of Tucayan."

He replaced his knife in the scabbard at his belt. "I have heard of what Morales did to Tucayan; it is merely one of the many payments that we will have to make to purchase freedom. But freedom, at any price, is cheap."

My heart suddenly warmed to this earnest patriot. "I met an Irish soldier on the road," I said, "Captain Monahan, one of the British legion, who offered me his trust. He helped me change the complexion of my face and hair, and he referred me to Tomas Carrasco and the Cantina Merida."

"And the sign of the Sociedad Patriotico—?"

"He gave me that as well."

"Your life in this city, Senor, will not be worth a silver real when Fuentes finds you out. He has little cause to love one who, in the space of an hour, vanquishes him with the sword and steals the heart of his lady."

"How can you know that, Manuel?" I cried hopefully.

"A mere matter of logic, a simple thing indeed. New Orleans was filled, one brilliant moonlit night, with the hue and cry of the chase, and the quarry was a tall, hatless, fair-haired man who had stabbed the noble Colonel Fuentes during the course of a duel in the Place d'Armes. We found, hiding in the apse reserved for San Isidro, such a man, who afterward refused to leave the Santa Lucrecia at the safe port of Coatzacoalos. Besides, the lady came to see him in his prison, and sought him out again in the fury of the storm. The lady journeys to Caracas and the Viking dyes his hair and beard and face and follows her, only to put his foolish head into a noose."

"Until the noose tightens, then Manuel," I said, "my foolish head is safe. It is a long way from Spain to the cathedral, and I intend—"

The sailor gave himself over to boisterous laughter. "But the cathedral has been reached, Senor, the journey ended, for the Senorita Dulce Lamartina will be married today at high noon—which is within the hour—to Colonel Adolfo de Fuentes, military aide of La Torre."

"Name of G—d!"

"The truth," said Manuel; "it catches you—no?" He grinned. "How will your efficient fists take care of such a situation; will you push over the big cathedral, or—?"

"We can, at least, Manuel, go to the wedding."

"Madness, Senor! Surely you would not do so wild a thing!"

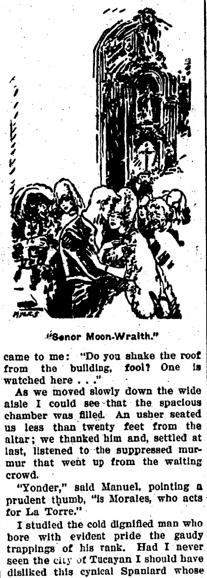
"Why not? Is not the wedding a public affair? I have taken care of myself for many years, Manuel, and expect to do so many more. If you hesitate to accompany me, or fear that evil might befall—"

"Not at all," he cried, in high good humor now; "I wouldn't miss it for the finest ship in the Indies!"

As we entered the soft gloom of the cathedral my heart was beating a swift tattoo against my ribs, my breathing was the labored breath of the spent runner, and my body shook in the palsy of arrant fear. I had begun to cherish a faint hope that a portion of the Senorita's love had been bestowed upon me. She had come to my prison, had tried to save me; she had sought me out in the fury of the storm, and the light in her eyes when she had found me . . . ah!

But who was Adolfo, what had he done to win her? Why should she marry this drunken Spaniard, whose loves were legion? When I had saved her, and brought her to those in the lifeboat, Adolfo had tried to kill me. A wild rage possessed me. De Fuentes would never marry her; I would throw myself upon him at the altar, I would put my fingers around his throat and hold them there until he died, and all the powers in the great cathedral would not stop me. I would tear . . .

A quieting hand was laid upon my arm and Manuel's warning whisper came to me: "Do you shake the roof from the building, fool? One is watched here . . ."



"Senor Moon-Wraith."

As we moved slowly down the wide aisle I could see that the spacious chamber was filled. An usher seated us less than twenty feet from the altar; we thanked him and, settled at last, listened to the suppressed murmur that went up from the waiting crowd.

"Yonder," said Manuel, pointing a prudent thumb, "is Morales, who acts for La Torre."

I studied the cold dignified man who bore with evident pride the gaudy trappings of his rank. Had I never seen the city of Tucayan I should have disliked this cynical Spaniard whose face was set in a mask of cruelty and whose eyes were veiled by heavy lids half closed as though to conceal his crafty thoughts.

This man, then, with the power of Spain at his call, had laid his hand upon a city, and had destroyed all the life it held. It hadn't been a gesture of war, I remembered, for not a man in Tucayan was armed. A deed of senseless brutality—no less—this destruction of a helpless town and the slaughter of its people. If Morales represented Spanish methods in Venezuela the cause of Bolivar, I reasoned, was just.

Hot anger burned within me, the racing blood pounded at my temples and, falling to trembling again, I gripped my fingers and ground my teeth in a fury of impotence. The glorious Lamartina was marrying the aide of this monster, and the colonel's emulation of the Butcher had earned for him already a reputation as infamous as that of his chief.

Now Manuel touched my arm. "Careful, my friend," he whispered; "such malignant looks ill become a wedding. If you would conserve your life you must control your face."

I had come to realize at last that, behind the unfavored face of the swarthy and clever Manuel lay thoughts most beautiful and profound; and I wondered vaguely what manner of man might be this Bolivar, the father of the revolution; wherein lay his hold upon his people.

Francisco had said to me: "If Venezuela had a thousand men like you, Senor, she would win her independence out of hand." Well, why not; could this game we call life offer to me any more fascinating sport? And if Bolivar were half the man that his amazing power over the people of Venezuela seemed to indicate, then service under him would be a glorious thing.

The swelling murmur of the throng was stilled with startling suddenness, and a silver thread of music filled the air. It deepened into the slow harmony of a march and, in time with it, came a muffled sound of footfalls. I bowed my head, for I dared not look. They were coming down the aisle beside us.

After an interminable wait the priest's deep voice filled the cathedral with toneless sound. I heard nothing of what he said; I could not even raise my eyes. She was marrying him, marrying that craven Spaniard. Wherein had I failed; had I followed her for this—to sit idly while she gave herself in marriage to Adolfo, to wait in muted impotence while another man . . . ?

I lifted my head at last and looked at them. They stood before the tall, serene, black-robed priest; Adolfo in the brilliant uniform of his rank, with his arm free now, and she in white, as fair, and as pale, as a lily. Polito, garbed as a lieutenant in the service of his majesty, Ferdinand VII, stood beside her, his head swathed in a bandage and other around his throat.

My mad worship drew my eyes to her downcast face and held them there. I saw again the tender curve of her cheek, and the sweetly pointing chin, which trembled, else my eyes were playing me false; tiny black curls touched an ear and caressed her neck, and her bosom rose and fell in an emotion beyond her control. The incongruous thought came to me that she seemed just like a little girl about to cry.

I looked and looked, filling my soul with her beauty; I gripped the carved bench in front of me and held myself rigid, concentrating every faculty into the intensity of my regard. Polito offered something to the colonel—a ring, I supposed. The calm father spoke to the Senorita and she extended one slender hand. It raised slowly, as though it were lifting the weight of the world, and her eyes came up with it.

I searched her face eagerly now, drinking in her loveliness. I would live this love of mine during the minute or two that she might still remain the Senorita Lamartina, and then—free of Caracas—I would seek forgetfulness in arms under the banner of Bolivar, for I could never go back again to the peace and quiet of the great plantations.

"Dios," said Manuel in an anxious whisper, "she has seen thee!"

Now I realized that the Senorita Dulce had found my eyes. She was looking past the colonel's shoulder; her lips were parted, her eyes wide, color came and went in her face, and a deep sigh escaped her.

With outstretched hand pointing in my direction she pushed past the prospective bridegroom and started down the carpeted aisle toward me. She seemed like one who moves in a trance, her eyes unseeing, her arms extended as though in supplication.

Before she had taken two steps I was on my feet and, in three strides, stood before her, catching the swaying figure as it fell.

With a childlike sigh she snuggled into the protection of my arms. "Senor Moon-wraith," she whispered in a tiny voice that was drowned in the swelling lamentations that filled the cathedral. She raised a hand, wonderingly, and touched my darkened hair. "Is it the Senor? I would—"

"None other . . . what have I done, Senorita?"

"Hasten," said a rasping voice at my elbow; "you must escape."

"Save thyself, Manuel, good friend," I said; "nothing they may do to me—"

Now the crowd was upon us in an overwhelming flood. Polito—his face as black as a thunder-cloud—tore the precious burden from my arms, soldiers barked orders, women screamed and children cried shrilly. Thrusting bodies propelled me swiftly toward the wide doorway, out of which we tumbled in a scrambling heap.

Eastern Nations First in Use of "Fireworks"

The origin of pyrotechny is unknown, but the art was early practiced in the East. Although inflammable compositions (known as Greek fire) were used in European warfare before gunpowder had become known among the western nations, fireworks, in the modern sense of the word, became known to them about the middle of the Fourteenth century and record is found of their having been used as an accessory of public pageantry in the year 1588. The early development of fireworks in Europe was due to the Florentines. Fireworks have been associated with the Fourth of July from the beginning. At the time of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, John Adams, in a letter to his wife, said: "It (Independence day) ought to be solemnized with pomp and parades, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward for evermore."

Virtue of Little Moment

I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but sinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat.—Milton.

For winter COLDS

WHEN your children have the "sniffles" from one wintry week to the next, give them Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil. Doctors say that its rich Vitamin A content wards off colds, increases resistance to illness, promotes growth. And its valuable Vitamin D and mineral salts build strong bones and teeth. Scott's Emulsion is good for adults too; it helps them keep well in winter. Its pleasant flavor makes it easy to take. Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J. Sales Representatives, Harold F. Papal Error That Cost Spain Much Territory

King Solomon offered to divide a small boy to whom two women laid claim, and won a great reputation for wisdom by so doing. Pope Alexander VI—born Roderick Borgia—actually did divide the world, and got no special credit for it even in his own day.

He was an abler administrator, a more versatile politician, a more far-sighted statesman, a greater patron of the arts and sciences, and a much better friend to the common people than was the Hebrew monarch, and that's about all the good it did him.

Vasco da Gama had rounded the Cape of Good Hope to give Portugal a foothold in India. Columbus had sailed west to discover what might prove to be a new continent, and he represented Spain. It was inevitable that there should be conflicting claims, and perfectly natural that the rival rulers should turn to the pope as the logical umpire.

Alexander did not find the problem difficult. For generations the Portuguese had been sailing southward along the west African coast and their claims were obviously to be preferred along the routes they followed. The Spaniards, through their Genoese agent, had found land in the West. What was easier than to draw a line from north to south on the map and let the broad Atlantic separate the new dominions of the rivals? Every one was happy.

It was seven years before the Portuguese discovered that Brazil stuck out so far to eastward that it crossed the pope's line, and that the holy father had given them far more than they had dreamed of. They were quick to colonize, and that is how Brazil speaks Portuguese to this day, although every other Latin-American land prefers Spanish.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Pain Quickly Relieved

Most cases of rheumatism and many diagnosed as neuritis are caused by germ action. Consistent use of B. & M., The Penetrating Germicide, will quickly relieve the acute pain and in most cases the B. & M. Treatment will stop the growth of the germs.

Your druggist should be able to supply B. & M. in $1.25 and 75 cent sizes. If not, send his name and we will ship direct. F. E. ROLLINS COMPANY, 53 Beverly St., Boston, Mass.—Adv.

Not Hard to Estimate Contents of Haystack

Estimating the amount of hay in a stack seems, on the face of it, to be largely a matter of guesswork, but federal experts have worked out a method of figuring which has been found to come within 5 per cent of accuracy on all occasions.

The method is based on the shape of the stack as the deciding factor. An overall measurement is taken; that is, from the ground on one side over the top to the ground on the other side. In the case of a round-top stack, for instance, forty-six hundredths of the width is subtracted from fifty-two-hundredths of the overall measurement and this result is multiplied by the width and length of the stack. With the cubic foot capacity of the stack, it is then a simple matter to divide by the number of cubic feet per ton of the various grains which go into the stack.

Lost Their Catch

Two dozen perch had the laugh on a pair of anglers at Seneca lake, New York. As the fishermen caught the fish they put them in a burlap bag hung over the side of the boat. Their only mistake was in failing to notice a large hole in the bottom of the bag, through which their catch disappeared as fast as caught.

A Story of Persistent Love

By Fannie Hurst

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THE fact that he was married to Gladys Cowper was to remain a phenomenon to John Bayley. That the lovely Gladys should ever have found in him sufficient attributes to claim not only her interest but her love, was something that even in the second and third year following their marriage, was to remain a miracle in the eyes of John.

First of all, Gladys, above everything, was so alive. She radiated a vitality that seemed to demand so much more than the sedentary life in a cottage which the young clerk in a large wholesale floral and tree nursery was able to provide her.

Gladys, before her marriage, had been the center of a group of youths eager to provide her with more than John could. She had lived her girlhood so recklessly in the spirit of dance, frivolity and adorable nonsense!

It gave a man pause to have come into the vast inheritance of a creature of this irresistible love-of-life. It gave him pause and more than that, it gave him the urge of high ambition.

A man had to justify his good fortune in having won a wife like Gladys. More than that, if a man wanted to hold her, he had to earn the right. John realized all this.

It gave him a sense of pride and at the same time filled him with a sense of torment.

What if the turn in the tide of his affairs was not to come in time? Gladys was so young, so unconsciously keyed to attract all who came within her orb. Even on the streets, heads swung after as she passed. In a group she predominated. A young husband had to look to his p's and q's.

Not that Gladys herself ever gave off the slightest awareness of the extent to which she kept her husband pitched to tiptoe. The first years were just happy, love-in-a-cottage; an adored wife and an adorable, good-looking young husband, who could be serious one moment and play-boy the next. True, resources were low. The position of clerk in the tree nursery was not remunerative and Gladys was filled with little wishes that tugged at John's heart.

"Darling, do you think we'll ever be able to afford just a second-hand little coupe? Wouldn't it be too heavenly having one to rush around in?"

"Oh, John, fancy being able to buy the mink coat in that window. Honestly, if I had just an imitation one, I'd curl up like a sardelle and die of happiness."

"Oh, honey, would I love a duck of a bungalow like that! Do you think we'll ever be able to afford one half as nice?"

John did think, a great deal. There was, of course, much to be said in behalf of his work at the nursery. The offices, within walking distance of their tiny suburban cottage, were set in the midst of acres of growing roses, aisles of spicy carnations, glowing riots of fuchsias, marigold, phlox, gladiolas and madonna lilies. From the window beside his desk, far as the eye could reach, there billowed the shining, tender green of young leaves and the wind-swept waves of color. It kept a man a little drunk with just the sense of rising sap and growing vegetation. It kept him somehow young, and in a strange ashamed way, reverential toward the beauty of the world about him.

All very well and good from John's angle. Pleasant unhurried work. The delightful proximity of his small home and lovely wife. The days that ended peacefully with Gladys waiting for him at the end of the floral pergola that led from his offices to the high road. All very well and good. But it got a man nowhere. One hundred and fifty dollars a month earned in the heart of a garden, got a man's wife nowhere.

Not that Gladys complained. Of course they talked and planned for a future, but there was something frighteningly indeterminate about that future. At best he, John, could only hope for an increase of from fifty to seventy-five dollars a month. Unless, of course, the unforeseen happened, and he managed to wangle his way into the firm. That, however, was unlikely. Only calamity or catastrophe could bring that about, and there were two husky young sons between him and the ultimate dream of membership in the firm.

Be that as it may, it must be said for Gladys that while she hankered for so many of the good things denied her, there was not in her attitude either rancor or bitterness. Just a wistfulness, and it was that wistfulness which, somehow, broke John's heart, and at the same time filled him with fear.

There was a country club set in the suburb where the Bayleys had set up their home. While not part of it, Gladys had opportunity to observe, from the remote vantage of sidelines, the gay-spirited existence of the polo-playing, hunting, golfing, dancing and motor doings of neighborhood couples about their own age.

Evening after evening, the strains of dance music floated to them from the adjacent club house and sometimes, over the top of his newspaper, John could see the foot of Gladys, seated at her handiwork, tapping, tapping, to the rhythm, as if it were all she could do to hold herself in leash.

Never a word, dear darling, but John grew afraid, particularly as never an evening that Gladys did not meet him with this or that recital of what hearsay she had been able to pick up about the country club crowd.

Well, John decided to himself, it was just as well it was happening and above all, it was good that he was realizing it before something concrete came along to jeopardize his happiness. This way at least, he could take the step while there was time. Without this stimulus, he might be content to go on to the end of time in the pleasant fastness of his position and the perfection that was his in his martial relations.

It was about this time that he decided to take the situation in hand. Wall Street seemed to present the first rung in his ladder. Not in the gambling sense! John was too shrewd for that. The way to wedge in was as bond salesman. Various of his friends had worked their way to brokerage positions and finally wealth by way of that intermediate step.

John did not intend to risk one penny of his two thousand dollars savings. Rather, he would get out of his rut and into a business that promised a future.

The way to hold a beautiful, restless young wife, was to widen her horizon. The way to keep pace with the younger generation around them was to live a little dangerously.

A man was a fool not to realize that.

Gladys, at first quite bowled over by the prospect of the radical change in their lives, admitted however to seeing the wisdom of a young man's alertness to his future.

Of course a small apartment in New York would be more diverting, and then there was John's future to consider. Naturally, a vigorous, up-and-coming young fellow, fairly bursting with ambition, must have his chance.

Curious, she told herself, how well John had kept this ambition in leash during those first few sweet peaceful years of their marriage! She had been lax and absurdly bovine in not discovering this latent restlessness in his makeup.

It was not easy dismantling the house. It was an absurd little affair, built like a gingerbread cottage and almost buried behind foliage and shrubbery that the nurseries had bestowed upon young Bayley when he married.

It was not until they were stripping the little garden of the furniture that together they had built and painted, that there arrived the moment when the equanimity of Gladys collapsed.

There were more tears than she had ever in her life shed and all in a volley, a revelation out of the blue.

"Oh, John—must we—must we—of course, I know it is for your good—a young fellow must have his chance—his future—but can't you stay back here, darling—and work toward it—quietly—just us. I haven't wanted you to know it, dearest, but it is breaking my heart to move into town, as just another wife of just another nervous, harassed bond salesman in just another flat."

Of course, the cat was out of the bag then. The most joyous bouncing elated cat imaginable.

The Bayleys still live in their gingerbread house.

It seems fantastic, but then life can be fantastic. The two sons who stood between John and membership in the floral company's firm were tragically killed on the same field at polo.

Wax Models of British Rulers Going to Decay

Probably the most interesting "waxworks" in the world, and possibly also the oldest, are threatened by decay. They represent the great kings and queens of England and, unknown to four out of five Londoners, are in Westminster abbey. They are more valuable, more historically accurate and more lifelike than any waxwork models ever exhibited in the galleries of Mme. Tussaud.

These figures, which are hundreds of years old, provide fascinating likenesses of England's sovereigns from the time of Edward III to the beginning of the Eighteenth century. Most of the effigies were modeled from life and carried in royal funeral processions. Nearly every figure is dressed in clothes which were actually worn by the royal personages depicted.

The older figures, which are most rapidly disintegrating, are made of wood, plaster or boiled hides, the more recent ones of wax. The latter, which include Queen Elizabeth, Charles II, William and Mary and Queen Anne, are housed in the loft of the Islip chapel, near the north transept of the abbey.

The wax portions of these figures are in a fairly good state of preservation but it is doubtful whether the clothes will hold together much longer.

Anomalous

The elderly mountaineer was hearing a radio for the first time. He expressed great surprise when a barytone solo issued from the loudspeaker, but when this was followed by the clear tones of a soprano he seemed petrified with astonishment. After the instrument was switched off, he turned dazedly to the owner. "Say!" he exclaimed. "What's thet thar critter anyhaow—male, er feemale?"

LION AND PYTHON CLASH OVER PREY

Big Snake Refuses a Fight to the Finish.

Big game hunting in the African wilds is no sport for weaklings. I have often, says a correspondent to the Cape Argus, sat through the cold night hours within ten feet of the bait without result. So when on two occasions snakes took an unrehearsed part in the proceedings, I was not altogether ungrateful to the "supers." The first time I played "lead" was in Portuguese East Africa some years ago.

To my hunting camp one afternoon came a native in haste, saying that a lion had just killed a young heifer about a mile away. The natives had driven the beast off before he had eaten his fill, and it was practically certain that he would return that night. I decided to "hide-up" for him.

He had killed near the edge of an open vlei, dotted with scattered bushes; and it seemed that an extra "bush" might escape his attention. Desiring to be as close as possible to avoid missing my aim—since I depended on the moonlight and a piece of white paper on my foresight—I had a pit dug about 10 feet from the carcass. This was 3 feet deep, and over it we erected a rough pole roof and covered it with bushes, so that it looked like an evergreen bush about 3 feet high.

A small aperture was left facing the kill and about sun-down I entered. The natives closed me in and went away, leaving me to await the dawn.

It must have been near ten o'clock, and I was divided between desire for a sleep and a smoke, when I heard a soft rustle near the kill. I jerked to attention and looked out. But instead of the soft stepping, tawny form I expected, I saw a long, sinuous gray shape, gliding in undulating waves towards the bait. A huge python had chanced on the scene, and apparently decided that the meat looked good.

The snake approached swiftly, and then coiled beside the carcass, raising his head several feet in the air and glancing from side to side, as though seeking to assure himself of the absence of enemies. Then the head sank back, and shot rearwards towards a small bush about 6 feet from the kill. Coil after coil left the pile and followed, and when the head rounded the bush and glided again towards the kill, the great length became evident.

This time the head glided straight beneath the carcass, came up on the other side, back and under again, and the kill was encircled by the first coil, showing like a gray cable in the moonlight. Back and under went the head, and as the tail stretched taut to the bush he had circumnavigated, and the second coil encircled it, the carcass rolled over slowly towards the bush. Then came a soft, snapping sound, as the bones gave way under the tremendous pressure of the great coil.

At the instant I heard a harsh snarl, and the owner of the meat by right of might emerged from the bush at a swift trot. The snake became aware of the arrival a second earlier than I did. As the lion reached the carcass the python was already half coiled, and the flat head shot like a streak straight towards him. With a growl he sprang aside and struck viciously at the gray cable; but as he turned, the snake coiled like lightning, and launched himself again.

After about five minutes the python suddenly shot out of coil away from the lion, and glided like a gray streak towards the bush. For an instant the lion watched his enemy's retreat; then with a low, fierce rumble of rage, turned to the meat.

As he reached it I drew a bead behind the shoulder and fired, and with a harsh grunt he collapsed on the kill. A few struggles to rise, two or three groaning snarls, and he lay still. I gave him another shot as he lay—to make sure he was not shamming—and then cautiously retreated to my camp and the welcome warmth of my blankets.

Christmas Greetings

This is the time when good wishes and good feelings are supposed to be found on every hand and expressed by word and deed. It is a beautiful old custom, this Christmas observation, and brings no evil in its train. With the rest of humanity we are willing to indulge this Christmas spirit and wish all our friends the best the season can bring. To our enemy we wish the season would bring a change of heart, as we can think of nothing that would tend more to increase their happiness and be a material help to both sides at the same time.

Be careful of your cream, now that cold weather is with us again. Taxpayers Held Meeting

The taxpayers of the Village and the Township of Holt held a meeting here on Monday and discussed the tax problems in the two local precincts. They could not do much here without some kind of a program to work on so, they elected delegates to go to Warren today to attend the county-wide taxpayers meeting.

The way it appears now they may be able to evolve some kind of a plan whereby the taxes can be reduced. As it is now taxes are so high that it is no longer taxation but in most cases outright confiscation. And by adding to the taxes of the one who is willing to pay to save what he has, because someone else quit paying, has not solved the great problem, the people are starting to realize that they must get together and work out a plan on which to equalize the matter.

The delegates from here that will attend the meeting are, T. B. Folden and E. O. Waagedahl from the township and Hjalmer Peterson from the Village. Anyone who wishes to go is invited to attend.

Hans Larson and family visited with relatives at Newfolden on Sunday.

E. A. Enger and family left on Tuesday for Bottineau, N. D. to make their home.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

The Junior Class are having a Christmas program in the English III class. Ruby Thompson, Helen Monson and Julius Faiman were appointed in the program committee.

A Christmas program was given in the Holt High School Auditorium on Thursday night.

In Modern History each pupil has a special topic to look up. This increases book knowledge.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

The new officers of the Little Citizens Leage are.
Hjalmer Gilbertson, Pres.
Gertie Johnson, Vice-Pres.
Gertrude Nygaard, Recess Officers.

The two teams in the seventh grade geography class were tied last week. Both sides had the average grade of ninty-three and one third per cent. Orlene and Gertrude had the best papers in the written work.

All of us are wishing all of you a very Merry Christmas.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The third grade pupils have been studying Christmas poems in their language class. They were asked to write original poems. These are the best:

Christmas is here and we are full of cheer
Because Santa every year.
by Jean Sorum.

Santa brings toys
For good girls and boys.
He's always full of cheer,
I'm glad he comes every year.
By Sylvia Haukeness.

Santa Claus comes here
every year.
He has a bag of toys
For all good girls and boys.
By Myers Larson.

The Fourth graders have been making up Christmas poems. This poem was the best:

It's Christmas Day today,
All the people are gay.
We'll have lots of fun
If I can get a gun.
—Milton Hanson.

The Fifth grade completed their poem cycles on Christmas.

CHRISTMAS

The Christ child is born,
None of the people mourn.
The world is full of cheer,
For the Christ Child is here.

It was Christmas Day,
And everyone was to sing,
For we had a new king,
To do and to bring.
—Adeloyd Larson.

SANTA CLAUS

Santa Claus is coming
With his pack of toys
He is coming to all
Good girls and boys.
—Opal Werner.

1st & 2nd GRADES

The Second Grade have finished their sand table of the First Christmas. On it they have the three wise men, the shepherds, and the stable scene.

We have been busy practicing our Christmas program.

We have our Christmas tree and will begin donating it on Wednesday.

We have just gotten our new library books and each of us is now reading one.

Only the foreman is working now on the local section job.

Thora Nilson

Funeral services were conducted on Saturday from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Mrs. Thora Nilson. Mrs. Nilson was born Sept. 29. 1849 at Haugen, Nessidalen, Norway. Her parents were, Anders A. Stromslie and Kari Haravika. In the Lutheran church of that community she was baptised and confirmed.

In 1877 she was united in marriage with Danial N. Nilson.

Hearing of the wonderful opportunities in this country they with their children immigrated to this country in 1903. From that time they have been farmers in this vicinity. Her husband died in 1921.

She leaves five sons and seven daughters to mourn her loss.

Rev. Redal officiated. Enterment was made in the local cemetery.

The Carlson Funeral Service had charge of arrangements.

Card of Thanks

We wish to express our thanks to our friends and neighbors for their kindness and help during the illness and death of our dear mother. We also wish to thank the Holt Quartet for the beautiful songs, Rev. Redal for his words of comfort, and those who brought flowers.

THE STORY

In the city of New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance of three figures, in ancient Spanish costume, two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights a duel with him with swords, and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered. Garde finds himself a prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, ship bearing arms and ammunition for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked and Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. He encounters a stranger and sees Dulce with De Fuentes and Polito. Learning his history, the stranger, who is Captain Monahan of the British legion under Bolivar, urges Garde to join the Venezuelans, but his mind is set on again seeing Dulce. Monahan directs him to friends in Caracas. There Garde, supplied by Monahan with the secret sign of the patriots, is welcomed at the revolutionary headquarters. With a companion, Manuel, Garde goes to the cathedral, where the wedding of Dulce and De Fuentes is in progress. Dulce recognizes him and leaves De Fuentes at the altar. She is torn from Garde's arms. He escapes.

CHAPTER V

—8—

Adios

Even as I entered the spacious home of Thomas Carrasco a file of soldiers deployed and surrounded it. Verily, Morales moved swiftly—and I knew I would never win free of Caracas. Yet, I had held her in my arms again, had lost myself in the sweet depths of her eyes, had heard her call my name, had felt the touch of her fingers. To my starved soul that was very much indeed, so I laughed gaily as the good Tomas, all of a tremble, hurried into my comfortable quarters.

"Do they seek thee, Senor—these soldiers?"

"Aye, Tomas; I am very valuable to them, for I have just disarranged a wedding, and I have put a lasting hurt into the heart of Colonel Fuentes."

"Ah, misfortune, Senor; it will bring death to all of us!"

"Not so, Tomas; this will bring death only to a poor French sailor who would feast his soul upon the beauty of a lady. This inn of yours is open to any traveler who has money to pay for accommodations. You know nothing of me; I shall assure them."

As a sergeant and five soldiers—and Lieutenant Polito—marched in from the patio I chose the side of the room farthest from the window, that I might stand as much as possible in the gloom.

The sergeant turned to Polito, who shook his head and touched his bandaged throat with caressing fingers, then the sub-officer addressed me: "Are you the devil, Senor, who has put a spell upon the Senorita Lamartina?"

"There is too much flattery in your words sergeant," I said. "You assign too much power to me, and I think it is the Senorita who has cast a spell upon all of us."

Polita started and stared.

"What are you called, Senor?"

"Timoleon Sourdez," said I, choosing at random the first name that came into my mind, "a sailor raised in the Indies, who will work for anybody, on any ship, at any time. I am a floater—that's all."

"How came you, Senor, in the cathedral?"

"I sat alone, this morning, in the Plaza San Jacinto, while people passed into the great church. A swarthy sailor, doubtless having sympathy for my loneliness, led me in so that I might view the wedding of the beautiful lady of Spain and the wise Colonel Fuentes. If evil has been wrought in the cathedral, Sergeant, it is no work of mine."

"Yet you—"

"The Frenchman, Senor, is ever a lover; and if I stared at her is it anything a thousand others were not doing?"

"Yet she—"

"Ah, must I let her fall, fainting, to the carpeted aisle; would that have been the act of a Frenchman? We are a chivalrous race, Senor, and we offer our arms—and our hearts—at all times. May one do less?"

Polito swung his legs, a half-smile on his handsome face. The sergeant shrugged his shoulders helplessly and turned toward his superior. "If the lieutenant desires to question him—?"

"Not at all," said Polito. His voice was a hoarse, rasping whisper, yet so puny an effort sent him off into a paroxysm of coughing.

"The Senor Lieutenant has an atrocious cold," I ventured.

Whereupon he smiled at me in the friendliest manner. "I was in a storm," he explained.

"I am sorry, and your head—?"

"Is doing nicely, thank you; it came in contact with a spar." He studied my face for half a minute. "Things might be worse, Senor."

"A philosophic view indeed," said I, "and one in which I cannot share, for soldiers at this moment surround my place of abode."

He laughed, a sorry effort, but sufficient. "A temporary arrangement, I think. Perhaps they imagine that the tall sailor, who has really offered only the Frenchman's worship to beauty, might escape—like a moon-wraith."

A wild surge of joy went over me. Polito knew me, he was my friend, he was telling me that I would be free! I could have thrown my arms around him. "And the guards, Senor Lieutenant—?"

"Have been placed there by order of Colonel Fuentes, and will be removed, therefore, only by his order. I shall see him, however, within the hour."

"I pray, Senor Lieutenant," I said fervently, "that I shall cause no further disturbance—if, indeed, I have been the cause of any. When my guards have been removed I shall take the way to La Guaira, where some ship—"

Now, watching his face, I saw that Polito did not brighten at this prospect, and I was glad, for, so long as the Senorita Dulce remained in Venezuela, there would I remain.

"Adios, then," said he.

I heard, in less than an hour, the crisp bark of orders and the sounds of shod feet on the stones of the patio; sounds that, fading swiftly, told me that the guards had gone, and that I was free again. Yet, free, I hesitated to leave Caracas, even if I were permitted. If I were free why should I go, why should I leave the Senorita, who was still the Senorita, and not yet the Senora de Fuentes? I could not hope to disarrange another wedding, and if Dulce were willing to marry Adolfo today why should she be unwilling tomorrow? Yet she did not love him; of that I felt very sure. Why, then should she marry him at all?

While I pondered thus, accomplishing nothing, a subtle fragrance filled the room. I dared not believe my senses. The Senorita? It could not be. Dulce would not come to see me here. I was dreaming; my insane worship had touched my brain, and I would see her, doubtless, all the rest of my life. I had heard of such a thing, or read of it, and had laughed.

A slim figure stood in the doorway, a figure all in lacy black, with a heavy veil that effectually concealed the features. One might not have known whether she were dark or light, but I knew.

"Again, Senorita," I said, bowing over a slim hand, "you find me in a prison. The visit of an angel could not have been—"

She touched my hair with trembling fingers. "It was light, was it not, Senor? I have dreamed of your hair as being light! was all that just a dream—and am I dreaming now?"

"I hardly know what has been real, and what—"

"Did I not see you, first in the moonlight, Senor, hatless, and with a strange light in your eyes? Did you not come to my aid when I called, and did not you find me in the storm? Did not your eyes draw me away from the altar? Are you now only the spirit of the man who was lost in a raging sea?"

I tried to laugh. "I am only a sort of shadow, Your Majesty, which will follow you everywhere. Wherever you go there will I go, for you are the star of my hope: your voice—"

"You are mad, Senor. You—you came to the cathedral, then, to—?"

"I went to the cathedral to stop the wedding."

"Mother Mary!" she gasped. "And I went to the altar with Adolfo to save you. You should have left the city ere this. They offered to sell me your life, your freedom. Why did you not go when you had the opportunity?"

"My life, and my freedom, belonged to me. You speak in parables, Your Majesty."

Now her blue eyes—a haunting fear in their depths—searched my face.

"Oh, I am ashamed," she sobbed, "ashamed. I would save your life because you have offered so much. They told me you were a prisoner in the dungeon, and were awaiting execution, and that I—"

"Your Majesty," I said, helpless before her, "Your Majesty . . . I feel very, very happy—and very humble."

"It was little enough for me to do, for you had saved—"

"If you do not love Adolfo, it was too much for you to do."

"Marriages in Spain, Senor, are not arranged by those most interested. Our parents did this long ago. In the three years that Colonel Fuentes has spent in Venezuela vast changes have come over him, and perhaps in myself as well. I do not feel so sure of myself as I did some time ago."

Now, although I was sure this visit of the Senorita Lamartina would be my death warrant—for Adolfo would know whither she had gone—I laughed in the fullness of a great joy, for I knew that De Fuentes had lost. "Has the air of Venezuela, Your Majesty, tarnished your tin soldier, or perhaps the moonlight of New Orleans—?"

"Can you jest so, Senor, when you must know they are seeking you out even now? You should never have come here; there is danger here for you."

"Assuredly; yet wherever the Senorita goes—"

"Caracas is filled with your enemies."

"Aye, and I have friends here, Senorita, the best friends that man ever had—fervent patriots who are working for the freedom of a great empire; men whom Spain will never conquer, soldiers who follow a man of destiny."

An expression of sadness touched her eyes. "Yet you told me, Senor, that you did not serve Bolivar."

"I did not serve him then, Your Majesty, but since that time I have looked upon the dead city of Tucayan, and a people who can sanction such an act of senseless brutality—"

"Ah, Senor, this nightmare of murder . . . This Bolivar who has brought about all the wars, and the killings. Would you serve this—this vulture, Senor?" She caught the lapels of my rough jacket in trembling fingers. "Senor," she said breathlessly, "my father spent his life in the service of Spain, and Polito, my brother, will doubtless do the same. One's country is one's life. Did you come to Venezuela, Senor, to offer service to Bolivar?"

"As you very well know, I followed the Senorita Lamartina to Venezuela."

"Did you journey to Caracas to serve Venezuela?"

"I saw the Senorita riding toward Caracas, and I followed her, as I would always."

"Did you visit the cathedral today because of your love for the fervent patriots?"

I heard the sounds of marching men, and knew that the guards had returned. This, then, was the end. "I would not hurt you, Senorita, yet I must tell you; I would tell you that my worship for you has been a sort of glory in my life, that your face has filled my dreams, that your voice has seemed—"

"Please, Senor, I cannot—"

"Under happier circumstances, Your Majesty, I could have offered very much, but with the soldiers waiting to take me to the dungeon, I can only tell you that I love you, can only offer gratitude to you for the joy my worship has given me."

She faced me, her eyes shining with tears. "There have been too many soldiers in my family, Senor, for me to love an enemy of Spain."

"Love is not a matter of nationality."

"No," she said sadly, "it is a madness, a wretched insanity."

She held our her hand and I pressed the fingers against my lips. "Ah, Senorita, I love you so!"

"Dios!" she gasped. "Today I tried to buy yiur liberty, and you didn't need it; tomorrow, when you need it, I shall try again, for you have offered so much. You will be free, then, to serve—"

"Ah, Dulce mia, may I—?"

"Adios, Senor."

* * * * * * *

As I sat through the passage of the leaden hours a darkness settled on my prison, and on my soul as well. I waited with the dull fatalism of the condemned for the coming of him who would see to my execution. Having lost the Senorita, there was nothing more that I could lose; life without her would be a futile thing, a vain effort, empty of all that which should make a life worth while.

A full moon, thrusting above the rim of the eastern hills, had just begun to spread its golden mantle over the city when Adolfo came; his guards, eight in number, stationing themselves outside my door that led into the patio. The recklessness that comes to one whose hours are numbered had laid a spell upon me.

"Well," I cried gaily as he entered, "if it isn't the stranded bridegroom!"

He stabbed me with a baleful eye. "You might not deem that quite so clever, Senor, if you had known I am familiar with your English."

Fear Spread of Cancer Through Tarred Roads

The system of tarring roads has come into great vogue throughout France and several objections have been raised. In the first place, it is said that the dust arising therefrom gradually strangles the trees along the roadside, but a more serious matter is that Doctor Forveau of Courmelles has uttered a cry of alarm and awakened the fear that tarred highways may cause an increase of cancer. He bases his fears on the existence of experimental cancer in mice succeeding local applications of tar on the skin and on cancers observed in workmen who handle tar.

Doctor Forveau fears that the dust of the road, when composed of siliceous granules with sharp points and edges, and impregnated with tar, may cause traumatisms of the mucosae of the respiratory and digestive tracts, capable of producing cancer, just as pulmonary tuberculosis may be facilitated in cutters of millstones by the siliceous dust that they inspire.

Maze Has Attractions

Herodotus tells of an Egyptian maze renowned 2,300 years before Christ. Whether the labyrinth was designed originally as an ingenious means of recreation, or as a no less ingenious means of inflicting psychological torture, is not determined. It might serve either purpose. Showmen at fairs and expositions have found it a profitable attraction

A Christmas Contest
By Katherine Edelman

IT WAS three weeks before Christmas. But already the atmosphere of the holiday season seemed to cover the city. Paul Rainer felt it as he boarded the street car that took him home each evening: already men and women were loaded down with packages that had all the earmarks of Yuletide gifts.

There was something about Christmas that always thrilled Paul; he even liked to repeat the name over and over to himself. He often wished that he might be selling toys and things at Christmas instead of being office boy at the big lumber concern where he worked.

"Gee, mother!" he yelled as he went in the door; "the Daily Mirror is giving prizes for the best decorated homes at Christmas. Wouldn't it be great if we could win one of them?"

"But, Paul," Mrs. Rainer spoke as if she hated to throw cold water on his enthusiasm, "you know we can't afford to do anything of that kind. I—I only wish we could for your sake," she added. "Maybe next year—"

Paul looked around the sparsely furnished room before replying: "Never mind, mother," he said, "for the time, I forgot about things. Darn money, anyway; why does it always have to block the way when we want to do something we like!"

"It—it doesn't always block the way, Paul; in fact, most of the time the absence of it is an incentive to do big things. If everybody had money many of the great deeds that have thrilled the world never would have been accomplished. And—and, Paul, don't you think we have been fairly happy without a lot of it?" She looked anxiously into his face as she put the question.

Paul was his old happy self when he replied: "Bet your life we have. Why, all the fellows say they'd rather come to our house than anywhere else. And—and, mother, if dad had lived we could have been as well off as the rest of them?"

In the hours that followed Paul seemingly forgot about the newspaper prize, but his mother did not. That night, after he had retired, she sat down in the little living room and pondered the matter over. Was there any way that she could help him to carry out his desire? What a happiness it would be to give him the joy of competing in the contest!

Suddenly she started from her chair and a smile came over her face. Her thoughts had drifted back through the years; back to childhood days. She remembered out on the farm how her mother had taught her to fashion many beautiful Christmas decorations out of scraps of tinfoil and colored paper. Always there had been a box in the attic where everything of this sort had been stored away.

And, as is often the case, the things we do in childhood stay with us; so she herself had continued to save bits of paper and other things as her mother had, and now there was a huge box of it stacked away in the closet. Perhaps out of it she could fashion something that would enable Paul to enter the contest?

For a whole week two busy persons worked across the table from each other every evening. Carefully small rolls of tinfoil and rolls of green-and-red paper were smoothed out and fashioned into Christmas decorations. Out of the discarded pieces of silver paper and tinfoil a great gleaming star began to take shape, a star that seemed to fill the whole room with its radiance. For, from the moment that mother and son began working upon it, it seemed to them as if the Star that led the Wise Men was shining again. From the love and care they had put into its making it seemed to be taking on real life, and all unconsciously their voices grew low and hushed as they worked upon it. And slowly from the red-and-green paper letters were formed, huge letters along simple lines that told the message that the angels sang in the long ago.

Had the Earmarks of Yuletide Gifts

"Mother, it's going to be great!" Paul would say every now and then in his enthusiasm. "There couldn't be anything better than this; why—why this star seems as if it were really alive!"

But Mrs. Rainer knew of the many lavish and expensive decorations that were going up all over town. The simple things that they were fashioning would probably show up very small beside such display. But she tried to keep faith with the faith of her son. And even though they should not get a prize, this work that they were doing was bringing them a great amount of happiness; a deeper and finer spirituality than they ever had known before. They seemed to have caught the very spirit of Christmas; each day seemed to be bringing them nearer to Bethlehem.

In a week the decorations were finished, and Paul took a ladder and set to work. Across the high side wall of the house that faced the street he placed the letters that had been woven from scraps of paper. When completed, they read: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." Above this he placed the silver star which had grown to be so real. With long extension cords and three reflecting lights that they had been able to hire from a nearby electrician for a small sum, the lighting system was complete.

Paul could scarcely wait until darkness fell to turn on the current. His hands trembled with excitement when finally the moment came, and his heart almost stood still as he looked up and saw the message that has thrilled the world for nearly 2,000 years stand out in bold relief. Above it the silver star gleamed brightly; to Paul it seemed more alive than ever.

"Mother, It's Going to Be Great!"

Through the days that followed mother and son thrilled as they noticed the many people who stopped outside. Cars from all over the city drove by each night, and the comments and praise that they heard was as music to their ears.

"Paul, do you think we could have got as much happiness out of this if we had lots of money and could have bought anything we wished?" Mrs. Rainer inquired of her son one evening.

"No, mother, I don't," Paul answered very quietly. "There wouldn't have been half the fun in it that there has been. I just don't care now whether we win a prize or not. To see how much beauty we have been able to make out of so little has been reward enough. And it has taught me a lesson I will never forget. Oh, mother!" his voice grew excited, "you are just wonderful—you are! Who but you would have thought of such a thing?"

But Paul did win a prize—to the surprise of his mother and himself he won the biggest prize the paper had offered—$200. The simplicity of the design, the artistic skill that love and care had woven into it, the contrast between it and other elaborate decorations entered, and the evident spirituality of the message all lent their influence toward the final decision. Three times the judges drove by to see it, and each time they grew more impressed. There seemed to be a strange radiance about this particular exhibit that they could not account for. They could not know that it came from all that had been put there by loving hands. But all were unanimous in deciding that it merited the first and best prize.

It is doubtful if any two ever spent a more wonderful and joyous Christmas than Paul and his mother. They could scarcely credit the fact that their work had been counted the best in the whole city. And the prize meant much to two who had to scrimp and save for so many years. To them $200 was a very large amount—it would buy many needed things.

But over and above this was the thought that the thing they had fashioned from almost nothing but faith and love had been considered worthy of a prize.

And as they stood in front of the modest little home after the judges had left and looked up toward the great, glistening star that seemed to smile down at them, they were both filled with the deepest and most wonderful happiness that even Christmas can bring. Love and faith had once again found a way! Its star was shining brightly for the grateful pair!

Little Damage Done by Missile, as It Happened

Mark Twain, at a publishers' dinner in New York, talked of his reporting days in Virginia City.

"We were trying a horse thief one day," he said, "and all of a sudden the big, burly scoundrel pulled off his boot and threw it at the judge. It was a heavy boot, too. It was studded with hobnails . . . I am still rather proud of the way I wrote up that little incident, doing it neatly, and at the same time getting back on a rival reporter whom I disliked. I got it all in one paragraph—something like this:

"'Suddenly the blackguardly thief, pulling off his boot, hurled it with all his might straight at the judge's head. This desperate act might have been attended with most disastrous consequences, but, fortunately, the missile only struck a reporter, so that no harm was done.'"—Pathfinder Magazine.

This fact brought out information from Kentucky that many thoroughbred horsemen there are raising their foals on a nurse cow via the bucket route.—Prairie Farmer.

THE MEEKER GIRLS

A Broken Dream Restored

By Fannie Hurst

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

EVEN with such terms as "old-maid," and "maiden-lady," practically gone out of the language, there was something about the five unmarried Meeker sisters that did suggest them.

The Meeker girls were so apologetically unmarried. Each and every one of them met you on the supposition that you questioned her standing.

The old homestead, inherited from their parents, was filled with twittings among themselves and to their friends, when they called, of opportunities that might have been.

If Lily had cared to accept Tom White!

It was known, among the Meeker girls, that in 1899, during a two weeks' trip to the Adirondacks, Edith had three times refused a young Canadian trader from Quebec who had since become a coal baron.

Meta, long and affectionately indicted by her sisters as the flirt of the family, had "turned down" right and left.

After the battle of Vimy Ridge, Ella confessed to a secret fiance who had fallen.

Teena, the youngest, although non-committal, gave you the feeling that life had not passed her by. Besides, it was a fact that Nicholas Lang, a widower of standing in the town, was calling on her.

Every girl, at one time or another in her life, has a chance to marry, the Meeker girls were forever protesting, perhaps too loudly. Thank goodness, not one of us has ever felt the need to marry just for the sake of being married. Naturally we've had chances. Not that it's the sort of thing we discuss . . .

Strangely, this defense-mechanism was not one which the girls employed solely with the friends outside the home, who as time went on began to refer to them collectively as "The Meeker Girls." It was something they practiced assiduously among themselves, keeping their spirits agog, on the buoyancy of a self-induced state of mind.

"Meta, it's an outrage the way you treat men! After all, no one expects you to feel called upon to marry every one who asks you, but surely you might let one or two of them call at the house."

"If I were to let every man call who drops into the office to ask me, we'd have the neighbors all talking. Just because I happen to be a stenographer in a law office doesn't give them the right to presume, and they might as well know it."

With Lily now, it was different. After all, the affair with Tom White was one to leave its imprint across a lifetime. The world thought Tom White had died of influenza following the World war. The Meeker sisters knew better. Tom White, just as surely as if they had seen it disintegrate, had taken to his bed of a broken heart, after Lily had spoken her sorrowful refusal. It was somehow fitting that Lily should continue to keep her heart locked in its tower. . . . Ella, too, for that matter. Poor Ella, whose secret garden had been blasted in full bloom. . . .

And so it went among themselves. And life, in the Meeker homestead, if it appeared monotonous to the beholder, was far from that to the girls.

There was Meta. Evening after evening, around the pleasant sitting room fire, Lily, seated as usual, Turkish fashion on the sofa, Ella stitching away at handiwork, the girls would listen to Meta.

Oh, but she was a naughty, darling, heartless sinner! No wonder, even with her equal share in the comfortable little estate shared by the sisters, Meta had decided to venture out into the business world. She was just the type to make contacts, or rather, as the girls giggled among themselves, to avoid them.

The way Meta handled the difficult situation of the men about her in the office was masterful! Naturally they swarmed about her. Even at thirty-eight, there was a sparrow prettiness to Meta, but lots of good it did the men. Evening after evening, filled with drolleries, merciless in her high-handedness and oh, so comical in her world pictures of the luckless creatures who wooed her, Meta recited her days.

"And he comes into the office where I am sitting pretending to be bent over my typewriter and says: 'Miss Meta—'"

"You don't let him call you Meta, do you darling?"

"That's what I'm coming to, honeys, if you'll let me. 'Miss Meta,' he says, 'the boys tell me you're just the coyest young girl in this office and make all the flappers look like prayer meeting.'"

"Nerve!"

"Nerve doesn't express it. Nothing in the world on his mind but dating up with me. Oh, you have to be in business to know what it means to keep a man in his place."

"Would he propose, Meta?"

"Would he propose? Give a man like that an inch and he'd be calling her every night!"

"That's right, darling, keep them in their places."

If it percolated through at all, to the Meeker girls, who in the forties and fifties, were lean and rather plucked-looking, that pathos and amusement were blended in the attitude of their friends, certainly that consciousness was slow to reach the close little inner circle.

Romance brushed this circle night after night, sat in flushes on the dry flushed cheeks of the sisters, warmed the recesses of the draughty old house.

Then came the time when, outside that inner sanctum, the amusement of friends became laughter and the laughter, derision.

Man-crazy as the Meeker girls. That sounds like a Meeker pipe-dream. Hear the latest? Another secret lover has sued for Lily Meeker's hand. Accent on the secret!

That was the beginning of a strange and deadening thing that began to happen to the Meeker girls. Delicately bred, sensitive to the intonation or the suppressed laugh, there seemed to seep slowly into that home, as the girls wore on in years, awareness that the cat of pretense was out of the bag. More and more silently the girls gathered about their little circle, evenings; less and less they came to discuss, with friends, the repudiated amours and wooings. Even Meta, as time wore on, came more and more to maintain silence concerning the many overtures of the men about the office.

It was during the period of those silent, rather dreadful years in the great old house that had used to ring to the tales of conquest, that Nicholas Lang, seventy-one, took Teena Meeker, fifty-three, off one day to the town of Greenwich, Conn., and married her!

A Meeker sister had succumbed. A Meeker sister, marrying, had proved to an all too cynical world that she was desirable in the eyes of a man. It gave authenticity, it gave reality, it gave authority, not only to Teena, but to the Meeker sisters.

Something flowed back into the eyes of the remaining four. The old light of conquest. The old vistas of romance. The old air of desirability.

The Meeker sisters are once more reciting with authority the sagas of the suitors who have sued in vain.

There is even about Teena, the wife, a slight air of sheepishness toward her sisters, for the humanness of not only having permitted herself to be wooed, but won.

Real Beauty Matter of Form, Color and Taste

Many persons believe that to be beautiful and artistic the work of man must be expensive. Cheap things are considered tawdry and even vulgar. Articles that are useful are also barred by some individuals who consider themselves capable of judging.

Edward P. Richardson, educational director of the Detroit Institute of Arts, holds different ideas. He declares beauty to be a matter of form and color and that good design need not be expensive. To prove that his theory is correct Mr. Richardson started out with a reasonable sum of money provided by the Junior league to buy useful articles that would conform to the requirements of artistic beauty.

By visiting department stores, hardware establishments, chinaware emporiums, Mr. Richardson collected 188 different articles, not one of which cost more than 50 cents and most of them much less, and assembled them in a corridor of the art institute where an exhibition of American painting was on view. They included tableware, glassware, curtain materials, table covers and napkins. The exhibition attracted much attention and there was no dispute regarding the claim that the expert had proved his contention.

Pepper and salt shakers need not offend the lover of the beautiful, and cups and saucers can be decorative and at the same time have the element of utility. By keeping this fact in mind housewives can make life more pleasant. Manufacturers would do well to examine the collection made by Mr. Richardson, and if they will learn the lesson he set about to teach they will improve the standard of taste and find it profitable.—Miami Herald.

Adams, English; those of Jackson, Scotch-Irish; of Van Buren, Dutch; of Harrison and Tyler, English; of Polk, Scotch-Irish; of Taylor, Fillmore and Pierce, English; of Buchanan, Irish; of Lincoln, Johnson and Grant, English; of Hayes, Scotch; of Garfield, English, though his mother was of Huguenot descent; of Arthur, Scotch-Irish; of Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison, English; of McKinley, Scotch-Irish; of Roosevelt, Dutch; of Taft, English; of Wilson, Scotch-Irish; of Harding and Coolidge, English; of Hoover, Swiss.

Odorless Skunks

The much maligned polecat, mophitis mephitis, to give his scientific name, is on the way to losing its one claim to notoriety. Thanks to intensive breeding experiments, the odorless skunk has come to stay. Not only has careful breeding, supplemented by veterinary surgery, removed the objectionable feature of close companionship with the wood "pussy," but the animals also are stripeless. Although experiments are not fully concluded, it is felt that these hygienic polecats have reached a stage of development where they may be offered to the world's fur market.

Looking Forward

Joseph spent his vacation with a great-aunt who showed the lad all of her keepsakes.

The lad's sixth birthday was drawing near and a member of the family inquired what he wished most for a gift.

"A mustache cup," he announced.

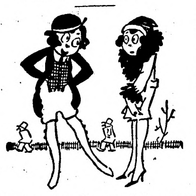
Not Nice

For nearly an hour she had been compelled to listen to the conversation of a fatuous admirer.

"I fell off my bicycle last week and was knocked senseless," he chuckled.

"When do you expect to get better?" she asked quickly.—Border Cities Star.

HAS HE EATEN IT?



Sporty Girl—He says he's a good judge of horse flesh.

Innocent Thing—Mercy, Ethel, do you think the man has actually eaten the flesh of a horse?

Sympathy

Employer—Just how would it affect you, Smithers, if we let you go?

Bookkeeper—I'd have to tend the baby, sir, and wash dishes and scrub the kitchen floor and—

Employer—Say no more. I'll let some single man go instead.

It Can Be Done
